The committee point out that accidents have occurred in the "Soo" Canal and in the Manchester Ship Canal; but the conditions, in the first place, were decidedly different, and, in the second place, they proved of no serious consequence as a hindrance to traffic or material injury to the canal. The "Soo" Canal has been in operation as a lock canal for some fifty years, it has been enlarged from time to time, and to-day accommodates a larger traffic than passes through all the ship canals of the world combined. It is a sufficient answer to the objections to say that this experience should have a determining influence in arriving at a final conclusion, for the inherent problems of lock-canal construction are as well understood by American engineers as any other problems or questions in engineering science. The proposed deep waterway with a 30-foot channel from Chicago to tide water, which has been surveyed by direction of Congress, proposes an expenditure of $303,000,000, and several locks with a lift of 40 feet or more. The enlargement of the Erie Canal by the State of New York at an expenditure of $101,000,000 involves engineering problems, including lock construction, not essentially different from those inherent in the lock-canal project at Panama; and if these problems can be solved by our engineers at home, it stands to reason that we may rely upon their judgment that they can be solved at Panama.

The majority of the Senate committee objects to the proposed dam at Gatun, and says that—

> Earth dams founded on the drift and silt of ages, through which water habitually percolates, to be increased by the pressure of the 85-foot lock when made, has been referred to by many of our technical advisers as another element of danger. The vast masses of earth piled on this alluvial base to the height of 135 feet will certainly settle, and as the drift material of this base or foundation has varying depth, to 250 feet or more, the settlement of the new mass, as well as its base, will be unequal, and it is predicted that cracks and fissures in the dam will be formed, which will be reached and used by the water under the pressure above mentioned, and will cause the destruction of the dam and the draining off of the great lake upon which the integrity of the entire canal rests.

But all of this is mere conjecture. The evidence of Engineer Stearns, a man of large experience, and of Engineer Harrod, familiar with river hydraulics and levee construction, and many others, is emphatically to the contrary. There is not an American engineer of ability, nor an American contractor of experience, who would not undertake to build the proposed dam at Gatun and guarantee its safety and permanency without any hesitation whatever. The alternative proposal of a dam at Gamboa would be as objectionable upon much the same ground, and the dam there, which is indispensable to the sea-level project, has also been considered unsafe by some of the engineers. In all questions of this kind the aggregate experience of mankind ought to have greater weight than the abstract theories of individuals, and I am confident that our engineers, who have so successfully solved problems of the greatest magnitude in the reclamation projects of the far West, and in the control and regulation of the floods of the Mississippi River, will solve with equal success similar problems at Panama.

The committee further says that the sea-level project contemplates the removal of some 110,000,000 cubic yards of material, while the lock canal would require the removal of only about half that amount, and that, in other words, there is a difference of some 57,000,000 cubic yards, which, "to omit to take out * * * is to confess our impotence, which is not characteristic of the American people or their engineers or contractors." By this method of reasoning a nation which can build a battle ship of 16,000 tons displacement is impotent if it can not build one of twice that tonnage, and if this reason applies to quantity of material, why not say that a nation which can dig a canal 150 feet wide through a mountain some 7 miles in length admits its impotence if it can not dig one 300 feet wide, or 600 feet, if it should please to do so? But why should it be less difficult or a declaration of impotency on the part of our engineers to build a safe lock canal, including a satisfactory and safe controlling dam at Gatun? As I conceive the problem, it is one of reasonable compromise, and while I do not question the ability of American engineers and contractors to build a sea-level canal, I am convinced by the facts in evidence that they can not do it within the time and for the money assumed by the advocates of the sea-level project.

This question of time is of supreme importance. Ten years in a nation's life is often a long space in national history. Many times the map of the world has been changed in less than a decade. No man in 1890 anticipated the war with Spain in 1898, and no man in 1906 can say what may not happen before the next decade has passed. The progress during peace is far greater in its permanent effect than the changes brought about by war. The world's commerce, the social, commercial, and political development of the South American republics and of Asiatic nations, all depend, more or less, upon the completion of an isthmian waterway. It is the duty of this nation, since we have assumed this task, to construct a waterway across the Isthmus within the shortest reasonable period of time. Valuable years have passed, valuable opportunities have gone by. In 1881 De Lesseps, with supreme confidence and upon the judgment of his engineers, anticipated the opening of the Panama Canal in 1888. That was nearly twenty years ago. Shall it be twenty years more before that greatest event in the world's commercial history takes place? Had De Lesseps, in 1879, gone before the International Congress with a proposition for a feasible canal at reasonable cost, free from prejudice or bias, had he then adopted the American suggestion for a lock canal, he would have lived to see its completion, and the world for fifteen years would have had the use of a practical waterway across the Isthmus.

As to safety in operation, which the committee discuss in their report, there is one very important point to be kept in mind, and that is that nine-tenths, or possibly a larger proportion, of shipping will be of vessels of relatively small size. If this should be the case, then the sea-level project contemplates a canal chiefly designed to meet the possible needs and contingencies of a very small number of vessels of largest size, while the lock canal provides primarily for the accommodation of the class of steamships which of necessity would make the largest practical use of the isthmian waterway. Now, it stands to reason that special precautions would be employed during the passage of a very large vessel, either merchantman or man-of-war, and even if necessity should demand the rapid passage of a fleet of vessels, say twenty or thrity, it is not conceivable that a condition would arise which could not be efficiently safeguarded against by those in actual charge and responsible for the safety in the management of the canal. Considering the immense tonnage passing through the "Soo" Canal, which would not pass through the Panama Canal for a century to come, the very few and relatively unimportant accidents which have occurred during the fifty years of operation of that waterway are in every respect the most suggestive indorsement of the lock-canal project which could be advanced.

The time of transit, in the opinion of the majority committee of the Senate, would be somewhat longer in the case of a lock canal. This may be so, though much depends upon the class of ships passing through and their number. To the practical navigator the loss of a few hours would be a negligible quantity compared with the higher tolls that would have to be charged if an additional $100,000,000 is expended in construction and an additional interest burden of at least $2,000,000 per annum has to be provided for. I understand that the actual value of an hour or two in the case of commercial ships of average size would be a matter of comparatively no importance in contrast with the all-suggestive fact that the alternative project of a sea-level canal would provide no navigation whatever across the Isthmus for probably ten years more. If it is an advantage to gain an hour or two in transit ten years hence by having no trans-Isthmian shipping facilities for the ten years in the meantime, then it might as well be argued that it would be better to project a sea-level canal 300 feet wide at every point, so that the commerce of the year 2000 may be properly provided for. But to the practical navigator of the year 1916, who leaves the port of New York for San Francisco by way of Cape Horn, a possible loss of two or three hours or more would be many times preferable, if the Isthmus were open for traffic, to a certain loss of from forty to fifty days to make the voyage all around South America.

Upon the question of cost of maintenance the majority committee in their report point out that the Board of Consulting Engineers did not submit the details of any estimate of cost of maintenance, repairs, etc., but they say that this factor was properly taken into account by the minority, favoring a lock canal. Now, there is probably no more important question connected with the whole canal problem than this, for if the annual expense of maintenance, to be provided for by Congressional appropriations, should attain to such an exorbitant figure as to make any fair return upon the investment impossible, it is conceivable that the most serious political and financial consequences might arise and the success of the enterprise itself might be placed in jeopardy. Upon a maximum cost, in round figures, of $200,000,000 for a lock canal, and of $300,000,000 as a minimum for a sea-level canal, the additional annual interest charge would be at least $2,000,000 more.

But Mr. Stearns estimates that under certain conditions a sea-level canal might cost as much as $410,000,000, which would add millions of dollars more per annum to the fixed charges which must be included in the cost of maintenance, to say nothing of a possibly much higher cost of operation. I also can not agree to the statement that the cost of operation of a sea-level canal would be $800,000 per annum less than in the case of a lock canal; but, on the contrary, I am fully satisfied that the expense would be very much greater in the sea-level project if proper allowance is made for interest charges upon the additional outlay, which can not be rightfully ignored. Upon this important point the evidence of the engineers and of the minority members of the Board is strongly in favor of the lock-canal project.

As regards ultimate cost, the estimates of the majority are very much more indefinite and conjectural than the more carefully prepared estimates of the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers. Upon this point the majority of the Senate committee say:

> There are two estimates now before the Senate, both originating with the Board of Consulting Engineers. The basis of computation of cost at certain unit prices was adopted unanimously by the Board, and we are told that the cost, with the 20 per cent allowance for contingencies, will be, for the sea-level canal, the sum of $247,021,200. Your committee has adopted the figures stated by the majority on page 64 of its report of a total of $250,000,000 for the ultimate final cost of the sea-level canal.

The estimate of the minority for a lock canal at a level of 85 feet is, in round figures, $140,000,000, or about $110,000,000 less than for a sea-level canal, which would represent a difference of $2,200,000 per annum in interest charges at the lowest possible rate of 2 per cent. The majority of the Senate committee attempt to meet this difference by capitalizing the estimated higher maintenance charge, which they fix at $800,000 per annum, and they thus increase the total cost of a lock canal by $40,000,000; but this, I hold, involves a serious financial error, unless a corresponding allowance is made for the ultimate cost of the sea-level project. There is, however, no serious disagreement upon the point that a sea-level canal in any event would cost a very much larger sum as an original outlay, certainly not less than $120,000,000 more, and in all probability, in the opinion of qualified engineers, including Mr. Stevens, the chief engineer, possibly twice that sum.

Reference is made in the report to the probable value of the land which will be inundated under the lock-canal project with a dam at Gatun, and the value of which has been approximately placed at $300,000. The majority of the Senate committee estimate that this amount might reach $10,000,000, or as much as was paid for the entire Canal Zone. The estimate is based upon the price of certain lands required by the Government near the city of Panama, but one might as well estimate the worth of land in the Adirondacks by the prices paid for real estate in lower New York. The item, no doubt, requires to be properly taken into account, but two independent estimates fix the probable sum at $300,000 for lands which are otherwise practically valueless and which would only acquire value the moment the United States should need them. In my opinion, the value of these lands will not form a serious item in the total cost of the canal, and I have every reason to believe that independent estimates of the minority engineers of the Consulting Board, and of Mr. Stevens, may be relied upon as conservative.

The majority of the Senate committee further say that—

It is not necessary to dwell upon the fact that all naval commanders and commercial masters of the great national and private vessels of the world are almost to a man opposed unalterably to the introduction of any lock to lift vessels over the low summit that nature has left for us to remove.

I am not aware that any material evidence of this character has come before the Senate Committee on Isthmian Affairs, investigating conditions at Panama. I do know this, however, that until very recently it has been the American project to construct a lock canal. All the former advocates of an American canal by way of Panama or Nicaragua, or by any other route, contemplated a lock canal of a much more complex character than the present Panama project. All the advocates of a canal across the Isthmus, including many distinguished engineers in the Army and Navy, have been in favor of a lock canal, and almost without exception have reported upon the feasibility of a lock canal across the Isthmus and its advantages to commerce, navigation, and in military and naval operations in case of war. The Nicaragua Canal, as recommended to Congress and as favored by the first Walker Commission, provided for a lock project far more complex than the proposition now under consideration.

Colonel Totten, who built the Panama railroad, recommended the construction of a lock canal as early as 1857; Naval Commissioner Lull, who made a careful survey of the Isthmus in 1874, recommended a lock canal with a summit level of 124 feet and with 24 locks. Admiral Ammen, who, by authority of the Secretary of War, attended the Isthmian Congress of 1879, favored a lock project, in strong opposition to the visionary plan of De Lesseps. Admiral Selfridge and many other naval officers who have been connected, with isthmian surveying and exploration have never, to my knowledge, by as much as a word, expressed their apprehensions regarding the feasibility or practicability of a lock canal.

As a matter of fact and canal history, the lock project has very properly been considered as "an American conception of the proper treatment of the Panama canal problem." Mr. C. D. Ward, an American engineer of great ability, as early as 1879, suggested a plan almost identical with the one now recommended by the minority of the Consulting Board, including a dam at Gatun, instead of Bohio or Gamboa, and, in the words of a former president of the American Society of Civil Engineers, Mr. Welsh, "The first thought of an American engineer on looking at M. De Lesseps raised map is to convert the valley of the lower Chagres into an artificial lake some 20 miles long by a dam across the valley at or near a point where the proposed canal strikes it a few miles from Colon, such as was advocated by C. D. Ward in 1879. The site referred to was Gatun, and this was written in 1880 when the sea-level project had full sway.

So that it is going entirely too far to say that all naval commanders and commercial masters are in favor of the sea-level project. Admiral Walker himself, as president of the former Isthmian Commission, and as president of the Nicaraguan Board, favored a lock canal. Eminent Army engineers, like Abbot, Hains, Ernst, and others, favor the lock project. It requires no very extensive knowledge of navigation to make it clear that passing through a waterway which for 35 miles, or 71 per cent of its distance, will have a width of 500 feet or more, compared with one which, for the larger part, or for some 41 miles, will have a width of only 200 feet or less, must appeal to the sense of security of the shipper while taking his vessel through the canal.

But it is a question of general principles, and not of personal preference. Our concern is with a matter of fact, and not a theory. No shipper on the Great Lakes considers it a serious hindrance to navigation to pass through the lock of the "Soo" Canal; no shipper running 1,000-ton barges through the future Erie Canal will have the least apprehension of danger or destruction; no captain navigating a vessel or boat through the proposed deep waterway from the ocean to the Lakes will hesitate to pass through locks with a proposed lift of over 40 feet. These apprehensions are imaginary and not real. They are not derived from experience or from a summary statement of shipmasters and naval officers, but from the individual expressions and prejudice of a few who are opposed to the lock project. I am confident that if the matter is left to the practical navigator, to the shipowner, and the self-reliant naval officer there will be no serious disagreement of opinion that a lock canal, which can be built within a reasonable period of time, is preferable to any sea-level canal which may be built and opened to navigation twenty years hence or later.

There are two objections made by the majority of the Senate committee against a lock canal, which require more extended consideration. These are, the protection of the canal in case of war, and the danger of serious injury or total destruction by possible earth movements or so-called "earthquakes." Regarding the military aspects of the canal problem, the majority of the Senate committee says:

The Spooner Act and the Hay-Varilla treaty contemplated the fortification and military protection of the canal route. No proposition affecting this policy is now before the Senate. In so far as the type of canal to be adopted has a bearing upon the jeopardy to or immunity of the canal to risk of malicious injury the subject of safety and protection is pertinent and most important. If a canal of one type would be more liable to injury than another, this liability should under no circumstances be neglected in determining the type or plan. It does not require argument that the use of the canal by the United States will cease if the control passes to a hostile power between which and the United States a state of war exists, but this is true whatever the type may be.

As the majority of the committee points out, "no proposition affecting this project is now before the Senate." In my opinion, none is necessary. The neutrality of the canal is by implication, at least, assured, and we have pledged our national good faith that the waterway will be open to all the nations of the world. Some time in the future, when the canal is completed and an accepted fact, it may be advisable to pursue the same course as was done in the case of the Suez Canal. The original concession for that canal provided, by section 3, for its subsequent fortification, but this was never carried into effect. By a convention dated December 22, 1888, between Great Britain, Germany, and other nations, the free navigation of the Suez Canal was made a matter of international agreement, and the same has been reprinted as Senate Document No. 151, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, under date of February 6, 1900.

This, in any event, is a problem of the future. The canal is the property of the United States, and we shall always retain control. In the event of war we shall rely with confidence upon our Navy to protect our interests on the Pacific and in the Caribbean Sea, but even more may we rely upon the all-important fact that it could never be to the interest of any other nation sufficient in size to be at war with us to destroy this international waterway, which will become an important necessity to the commerce of each and all. No neutral nation engaged in extensive commerce or trade would for an instant tolerate injury, destruction, or serious interference of the traffic passing through the canal on the part of another nation at war with the United States. To destroy as much as a single lock, to injure as much as a single gate, would be equal to an act of war with every commercial nation of the earth. In this simple fact lies a greater assurance of safety than in all the treaties which might be made or in all the fortifications which might be established to protect the canal.

The majority of the committee well say in their report, the power of mischief "is within easy reach of all." The possibility of an assumed occurrence is very remote from its reasonable probability. We have to rely upon our own good faith and the watchful eyes of our officers. Against possible contingencies, such as are implied in the assumed destruction of the locks, by dynamite or other high explosives, we can do no more than take the same precautions which we take in all other matters of national importance. We have to take our chances the same as any other nation would; the same as commercial enterprise would. Certainly the remote possibility of such an event, the still more remote contingency that the injury would be serious or fatal to the operation of the canal, should not govern in a decision to construct a canal for the use of the present generation instead of the generations to come. No canal can be built free from vulnerable points; no forts, no battle ships can be built free from such a risk. It would be folly to delay the construction of a canal; it would be folly to sink a hundred million dollars or more upon so remote a contingency as this, which belongs to the realm of fanciful or morbid imagination rather than to the domain of substantial fact and actual experience.

As a last resort, the opposition to a lock canal brings forward the earthquake argument. It is a curious reminder of the early and bitter opposition to the building of the Suez Canal, which had to fall back upon the absurd theory that the canal would prove a failure because the blowing sands of the desert would soon fill the channel. It was seriously proposed to erect a stone wall 4 feet high on each side of the embankment to provide against this imaginary danger to the canal. Another early objection to the Suez Canal was that the Red Sea level was 30 feet above the level of the Mediterranean, only set at rest in 1847 by a special commission, which included Mr. Robert Stephenson, the great son of a great father, bitter to the last in his opposition to the canal, which he considered an impracticable engineering scheme. There was much talk about the assumed prevalence of strong westerly winds on the southern Mediterranean coast, and the danger of constantly increasing deposits of the Nile, it was said, would render the establishment of a port impossible. It was necessary to place a war ship for a whole winter at anchor 3 miles from the shore to prove the error of this assumption and set at rest a foolish rumor which came near proving fatal to the enterprise.

Earthquakes have occurred on the Isthmus, and there is record of one shock of some consequence in 1882. The matter has been inquired into in a general way by the various Isthmian commissions, and assumed some prominence during the discussions and debates regarding a choice of routes. It was plain to even the least informed that the volcanic belt of Nicaragua constituted a real menace to a canal in that region, and one of the strongest arguments advanced in the minority report of the Senate committee of 1902, submitted by Senator KITTREDGE, now a leading advocate of the sea-level project, in opposition to the Nicaragua Canal, was the assertion of the practical freedom of the Panama Isthmus from the danger of earth movements.

The minority of the Senate committee of 1902 in their report, summing up the final reasons in favor of the Panama route (section 12):

> At Panama earthquakes are few and unimportant, while the Nicaraguan route passes over a well-known coastal weakness. Only five disturbances of any sort were recorded at Panama, all very slight, while similar official records at San Jose de Costa Rica, near the route of the Nicaragua Canal, show for the same period fifty shocks, a number of which were severe. (P. 11, S. Rep. 783, part 2, 57th Cong., 1st sess., May 31, 1902.)

In another part of its report the committee said:

> With the dreadful lessons of Martinique and St. Vincent fresh in our minds, we should be utterly inexcusable if we deliberately selected a route for an isthmian canal in a region so volcanic and dangerous, when a route is open to us which is exposed to none of these dangers and is in every other respect more advantageous.

And they quote Professor Heilprin, an authority on the subject, in part, as follows:

> It has, however, been known for a full quarter of a century that the main Andes do not traverse the Isthmus of Panama, and that there are no active or recently decayed volcanoes in any part of the Isthmus. So far, however, as danger from direct volcanic contacts is concerned, the Panama route is exempt. (Pp. 22–23.)

And, further:

> This district represents the most stable portion of Central America. No volcanic eruptions have occurred there since the end of the Miocene epoch, and there are no active volcanoes between Chiriqui and Tolima, a distance of about 400 miles. Such earthquakes as have occurred are chiefly those proceeding from the disturbed districts on either hand, with intensity much diminished by the distance traversed. The canal lies in a sort of dead angle of comparative safety.

The report continues:

> The situation being, then, that the danger from volcanoes at Panama is nothing, and that from earthquakes practically nothing, while at Nicaragua the canal would be situated in one of the most dangerous regions of the world from both these causes, the question should be considered settled.

This was the opinion of the committee of 1902; it was emphatic and plain in its language; it had considered expert views and the available data. It had before it the full report of the Nicaragua Canal Commission printed under date of May 15 of the same year, Chapter VII of which considers the subject at much greater length than has been done since that time and with a full knowledge of the facts and free from bias or prejudice. With the then recent occurrence at Mount Pelee in mind, and a full understanding of the liability of the Isthmus to seismic shocks of minor importance, the committee emphatically indorses the lock-canal project at Panama.

Much can be said with regard to this matter, and it is one which should receive, and no doubt will, the most careful consideration of the engineers in charge of the work. Seismic disturbances have occurred in all parts of the world, and they have occurred at Panama. Where they are not directly of volcanic origin they appear to be the result of subsidence or contraction of the earth's crust, and they have occurred and caused serious destruction far from volcanic centers of activity, among other places at Lisbon, Portugal, and at Charleston, S. C. Some sections of the earth, as, for illustration, Japan and the Philippines, are, no doubt, more subject to these movements than others, and sections subject to such movements at one period of time may be exempt for many years, if not ever thereafter.

The fearful earthquake which affected Charleston, S. C., in 1886 had no corresponding precedent in that section, nor has it been followed by a similar disturbance. Regardless of the terrible experience of 1886, the Government has now in course of construction at Charleston a navy-yard and a great dry dock, costing many millions of dollars, which will be operated by locks or gates, and, I presume, the question of earthquakes or earth movements has not been raised in any of the reports which have been made regarding this undertaking. Earthquakes were formerly quite frequent in New England, and they extended to New York during the early years of our history, and for a time Boston and Newbury, Mass, Deerfield, N. H., and particularly East Haddam, Conn., were the centers of seismic activity, which by inference might be used as an argument against our navy-yards at Portsmouth, N. H., and Charlestown, Mass., our torpedo station at Newport, or the fortifications at Willetts Point. The earthquake which destroyed Lisbon in 1755 might with equal propriety be used as an argument against the building of the extensive docks and fortifications at Gibraltar, but no one, I think, has ever questioned the solidity of the rock.

Seismology is a very complex branch of geologic inquiry into a subject regarding which very little of determining value is known. Theories have been advanced that under certain geological conditions earth movements would be comparatively infrequent, if not impossible. Whether such conditions exist at Panama would have to be determined by the investigations of qualified experts. It would seem, however, from such data as are available, that the local conditions are decidedly favorable to a comparative immunity of this region from serious seismic shocks, at least such as would do great and general damage. Nor can it be argued that the locks and dams would be exposed to special risk. The earthquake of 1882 did more or less damage, but the reports are of a very fragmentary character. Newspaper reports in matters of this kind have very small value. Injury was done to the railway, but not of very serious consequence.

If the risk exists, it would affect equally a sea-level canal, in that it would threaten the tidal lock, the dam at Gamboa, and the excavation through the Culebra cut. Very little is known regarding earthquake motions, and there are very few seismic elements which are really calculable in conformity to a mathematical theory of probability. It is a subject which has not received the attention in this country of which it is deserving, but enough of seismic motion is known to warrant the conclusion that the Senate committee of 1902 was, in all human probability, entirely correct when it made light of the danger of the probability of seismic shocks at Panama.

In fine, the earthquake argument has little or no force against a lock-canal project, and it has never received serious consideration as such or been used in arguments against a lock canal until the recent San Francisco disaster brought the subject prominently before the public. It is a danger as remote as a possible destruction of the proposed terminal plants at Colon and Panama by flood waves equal in magnitude to the one which destroyed Galveston in 1900, but such dangers are inherent in all human undertakings. They must be taken as a matter of chance and remote possibility, which for all practical purposes may be left out of account, except that the subject should receive the due consideration of the engineers and perhaps be made a matter of special and comprehensive inquiry by the Geological Survey. In any serious consideration of the facts for or against a lock canal, I am confident that the earthquake risk may safely be ignored.

The comprehensive report of the minority members of the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Affairs is a sufficient and conclusive answer to all the important points which are in controversy, and it remains for Congress to cut the "Gordian knot" and put an end to an interminable discussion of much solid and substantial conviction on the one hand and of a vast amount of opinion and guesswork on the other hand. All of the evidence, all of the supplementary expert testimony which may be collected or obtained upon the merits or demerits of either of the two propositions, will not change the fundamental basis of the position of those who rest their final conclusions upon American experience and upon the opinions and judgment of American engineers, and who favor a lock canal. While there is no question of doubt that such a canal can be constructed and can be made a practical waterway, there is a very serious question of doubt whether a sea-level canal can be constructed and made a safe and practicable waterway, at least within the limits of the estimated amount of cost and within the estimated time.

The view, which I have tried to impress upon the Senate, is nothing more nor less than a business view of what is, for all practical purposes, only a business proposition. If a lock canal can be built, useful for all purposes, at half the cost and within half the time of a sea-level canal, then I can come to no other conclusion than that a lock canal would be decidedly to our political and commercial advantage. A decision, however, should be arrived at. The canal project has reached a stage when the final plan or type must be determined, and it is the duty of Congress to act and to fix, for once and for all time, the type of canal, with the same courage and freedom from prejudice or bias as was the case in the decision which finally fixed the route by way of Panama.

Any amount of additional testimony and so-called expert opinion will only add to the confusion and tend to produce a more hopeless state of affairs. Let Congress fix the type in broad outlines and leave it to responsible engineers in actual charge of the construction to solve problems in detail, and to adapt themselves to local conditions met with, and new problems which in the course of construction are certain to arise. Let us take counsel of the past, most of all from the experience gained in the construction of the Suez Canal, an engineering and commercial success which challenges the admiration of the world. We know how near it came to utter defeat by the conflict of opinion, by the intrigue of conniving and jealous powers, and last but not least, by the ill-founded apprehensions and fears of those who were searching the vast domain of conjecture and remote possibilities for arguments to cause a temporary delay or ultimate abandonment.

It is not difficult to secure eminent authority for or against any project when the facts themselves are in dispute, and when the objects and aims are not well defined. The great Lord Palmerston, the most bitter opponent to the Suez Canal scheme, in want of a more convincing argument, seriously claimed that France would send soldiers disguised as workmen to the Isthmus of Suez later to take possession of Egypt and make it a French colony. By one method or another, Palmerston tried to defeat the scheme in its beginning and bring it to disaster during the period of construction. It is a far from creditable story. History always more or less repeats itself, whether it be in politics or engineering enterprise, but in few affairs are there more convincing parallels than in the canal projects of Panama and Suez. Lord Palmerston and Sir Henry Bulwer, then the ambassador at Constantinople, did all in their power to destroy public confidence in the enterprise, and they were completely successful in preventing English investments in the stock of the canal.

It was the same Sir Henry Bulwer who, in 1850, succeeded by questionable diplomatic methods in foisting upon the American people a treaty contrary to their best interests and for half a century a hindrance and the barrier to an American isthmian canal. We owe it chiefly to the masterly and straightforward statesmanship of the late John Hay that this obstacle to our progress was disposed of to the entire satisfaction of both nations. I only refer to these matters, which are facts of history, to point out how an interminable discussion of matters of detail is certain to delay and do great injury to projects which should only receive consideration in broad outlines and upon fundamental principles. If we are to enter into a discussion of engineering conflicts, if we are to deliberate upon mere matters of structural detail, then an entire session of Congress will not suffice to solve all the problems which will arise in connection with that enterprise in the course of time. I draw attention to the Suez experience solely to point out the error of taking into serious account minor and farfetched objections which assume an undue magnitude in the public mind when they are presented in lurid colors of impending disasters to a national enterprise of vast extent and importance.

So eminent an engineer as Mr. Robert Stephenson by his expert opinion deluded the British people into the belief that the Suez Canal would not be practical; that, even if completed, it would be nothing but a stagnant ditch. Said Palmerston to De Lesseps:

> All the engineers of Europe might say what they pleased, he knew more than they did, and his opinion would never change one iota, and he would oppose the work to the end.

Stephenson confirmed this view and held that the canal would never be completed except at an enormous expense, too great to warrant any expectation of return—a judgment as ill advised as it was later proven to have been entirely erroneous. I need only say that the Suez Canal is to-day an extremely profitable waterway, and that while the work was commenced and brought to completion without a single English shilling, through French enterprise and upon the judgment of French engineers, it was only a comparatively few years later when, as a matter of necessity and logical sequence, the controlling interest in the canal was purchased by the English Government, which has since made of that waterway the most extensive use for purposes of peace and war.

These are facts of history, and they are not disputed. Shall history repeat itself? Shall we delay or miscarry in our efforts to complete a canal across the Isthmus of Panama upon similar pretensions of assumed dangers and possibilities of disaster, all more or less the result of engineering guesswork? Shall we take fright at the talk about the mischief-maker with his stick of dynamite, bent upon the destruction of the locks and vital parts of the machinery, when history has its parallel during the Suez Canal agitation in "The Arab shepherd, who, flushed with the opportunity for mischief and with a few strokes of a pickax, could empty the canal in a few minutes?" Shall we be swayed by foolish fears and apprehensions of earthquakes or tidal waves and waste millions of money and years of time upon a pure conjecture, a pure theory deduced from fragmentary facts? Again the facts of canal history furnish the parallel of Stephenson and other engineers, who successfully frightened English investors out of the Suez enterprise by the statement that the canal would soon fill up with the moving sands of the desert, that one of the lakes through which the canal would pass would soon fill up with salt, that the navigation of the Red Sea would be too dangerous and difficult, that ships would fear to approach Port Said because of dangerous seas, and, finally, that in any event it would be impossible to keep the passage open to the Mediterranean.

It was this kind of guesswork and conjecture which was advanced as an argument by engineers of eminence and sustained by one of the foremost statesmen of the century. How absurd it all seems now in the sunlight of history. The Panama Canal is a business enterprise, even if carried on by the nation, and with a thorough knowledge of the general facts and principles we require no more expert evidence, so called, nor additional volumes of engineering testimony. The nation is committed to the construction of a canal. The enterprise is one of imperative necessity to commerce, navigation, and national defense, and any further discussion, any needless waste of time and money, is little short of indifference to the national interests and objects which are at stake.

Of objections for or against either plan there is no end, and there will be no end as long as the subject remains open for discussion. To answer such objections in detail, to search the records for proof in support of one theory and another, is a mere waste of time which can lead to no possible useful result. Among others, for illustration, there has been placed before us a letter from the chief engineer of the Manchester Ship Canal, who is emphatically in favor of a sea-level waterway. It would have been much more interesting and much more valuable to the Members of Congress to have received from Mr. Hunter a statement as to why he should have changed his opinions or why, in 1898, he should have signed the unanimous report of the technical commission in favor of a lock canal, while now he so emphatically sustains those who favor the sea-level project. It is not going too far to say, appealing to the facts of history, that Mr. Hunter may be as seriously in error in this matter and may have drawn upon his imagination rather than upon his engineering experience, the same as Mr. Robert Stephenson was in serious error in his bitter opposition to the canal enterprise at Suez.

Mr. Hunter, in his letter, argues, among other points, that the lifts of the proposed locks would be without precedent. Without precedent? Why, of course, they would be without precedent. Is not practically every American engineering enterprise without precedent? Was not the Erie Canal, completed in 1825, without a precedent? Were not the first steamboat and the first locomotive without precedents? Were not the Hoosac Tunnel and the Brooklyn Bridge feats of engineering enterprise without precedents?

Without precedent is the great barge canal which the State of New York is about to build, which will mean a complete reconstruction of the existing waterway which connects the ocean with the Great Lakes.

All this is without precedent. But it is American. It is progress, and takes the necessary risk to leave the world better, at least in a material way, than we found it. In the proposed deep waterway, which is certain some day to be built to connect the uttermost ends of the Great Lakes with tide water on the Atlantic, able and competent engineers of the largest experience have designed locks with a lift of 52 feet. That will be without precedent. On the Oswego Canal, proposed as a part of the new barge canal of the State of New York, there will be six locks, two of which will have a lift of 28 feet, and that will be without precedent, but neither dangerous nor detrimental to navigation interests.

Need I further appeal to the facts of past canal history? Is it necessary to recite one of the best known and most honorable chapters in the history of inland waterways—I mean the problems and difficulties inherent in the great project of constructing the canal of Languedoc, or "Canal du Midi," which forms a water communication between the Mediterranean and the Garonne and the Garonne and the Atlantic Ocean, one of the best known canals in France and in the world? Need I refer to that pathetic story of its chief egineer, Riquet, one of the greatest of French patriots, who, in his abiding faith in this great engineering feat, stood practically alone? Need I recall that he met with scant assistance from the Government, with the most strenuous opposition from his countrymen; that he was treated even as a madman, and that he died of a broken heart before the great work was finished?

That canal stands to-day as an engineering masterwork and as a most suggestive illustration of man's ingenuity and power to overcome apparently insuperable natural obstacles. It has been in existence and successful operation, I think, since 1681. For a sixth part of its distance it is carried over mountains deeply excavated. It has, I think, ninety-nine locks and viaducts, and as one of its most wonderful features it has an octuple lock, or eight locks in flight, like a ladder from the top of a cliff to the valley below. If in 1681 a French engineer had the ability and the daring to conceive and construct an octuple lock, will anyone maintain that more than two hundred years later, with all the enormous advance in engineering, with a better knowledge of hydraulics and a more perfect method of transportation and handling of materials, will anyone maintain that we are not to-day competent to construct a lock canal such as is proposed to be built at Panama upon the judgment of American engineers?

Mr. President, the overshadowing importance of the subject has led me to extend my remarks far beyond my original intention. I express my strong convictions in favor of a lock canal and of the necessity for an early and specific declaration of Congress regarding the final plan or type of canal which the nation wants to have built at Panama. I am confident that it lies entirely within our power and means to build either type of a waterway; that our engineering skill can successfully solve the technical problems involved in either the lock or sea-level plan; but there is one all-important factor which controls, and which, in my opinion, should have more weight than any other, and that is the element of time. If I could advance no other reasons, if I knew of no better argument in favor of a lock canal, my convictions would sustain the project which can be completed within a measurable distance of years and for the benefit and to the advantage of the present generation. Time flies, and the years pass rapidly. Shall this project languish and linger and become the spoil of political controversy and a subject of political attack? Can we conceive of anything more likely to prove disastrous to the canal project than political strife, which proved the undoing of the French canal enterprise at Panama?

Shall the success of this great project be imperiled by the possible changes in the fortunes of parties? Shall we incur the risk that changes in economic conditions, hard times, or panic and industrial depressions may bring about? Time flies, and in the progress of industry and commerce, in international competition and the growth of modern nations, no factor is of more supreme importance than the years with new opportunities for political and commercial development. Shall we, then, neglect our chances? Shall we fail to make the most of this the greatest opportunity for the extension of our commerce and navigation into the most distant seas which will ever come to us in our history, because of the demands of idealists, who, with theoretical notions of the ultimately desirable, would deprive the nation and the world of what is necessary and indispensable to those who are living now?

Vast commercial and political consequences will follow the opening of the transisthmian waterway. In the annals of commerce and navigation it is not conceivable that there will ever be a greater event or one fraught with more momentous consequences than uninterrupted navigation between the Atlantic and the Pacific. Little enough can we comprehend or anticipate what the far-distant future will bring forth, but this much we know—that it is our duty to solve the problems of to-day and not to indulge in dreams and fancies in a vain effort to solve the problems of an immeasurable future.

But money also counts. Can we defend an expenditure of an additional $100,000,000 or more for objects so remote, and upon the basis of theory and fact so slender and so open to question, when a plan and a project feasible and practicable is before us which will meet all of our needs and the needs of generations to come? Shall we disregard in the building of this canal every principle of a sound national economy and commit ourselves recklessly to an enormous waste of funds and to the imposition of needless burdens upon the taxpayers of this nation and upon the commerce of the world? At least $2,000,000 per annum more will be required in additional interest charges, at least $100,000,000 more will be necessary as an original investment. Do we fully realize what that amount of money would do if applied to other national purposes and projects?

I want to place on record my convictions and the reasons governing my vote in favor of the minority report for a lock canal across the Isthmus at Panama. I entered upon an investigation of the subject without prejudice or bias for or against either project, but I have examined the facts as they have been presented and as they are a matter of record and of history. I have heard or read with care the evidence as it has been presented by the Board of Consulting Engineers and the vast amount of oral testimony before the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Affairs. I am confident that the minority judgment is the better and that it can be more relied upon, because it is strictly in conformity with the entire history of the isthmian canal project. I am confident that the objections which have been raised against the lock plan are an undue exaggeration of difficulties such as are inherent in every great engineering project, and which, I have not the slightest doubt, will be successfully solved by American engineers, in the light of American experience, exactly as similar difficulties have been solved in many other enterprises of great magnitude.

I am not impressed with the reasons and arguments advanced by those who favor the sea-level project, which do not convince me as being sound and which in some instances come perilously near to engineering guesswork characteristic of the earlier enterprises of De Lesseps. I can but think that bias and prejudice are largely responsible for the judgment of foreign engineers so pronounced in favor of a sea-level project. On the contrary, I am entirely convinced that the judgment and experience of American engineers in favor of a lock canal may be relied upon with entire confidence, and that the enterprise will be brought to a successful termination. I believe that in a national undertaking of this kind, fraught with the gravest possible political and commercial consequences, only the judgment of our own people should govern for the protection of our own interests which are at stake. I also prefer to accept the view and convictions of the members of the Isthmian Commission, and of its chief engineer, a man of extraordinary ability and vast experience.

It is a subject upon which opinions will differ and upon which honest convictions may be widely at variance, but in a question of such surpassing importance to the nation, I, for one, shall side with those who take the American point of view, place their reliance upon American experience, and show their faith in American engineers.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President, I ask for the adoption of the following order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). The Senator from South Dakota asks for the adoption of an order which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Friday, June 15, 1906, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 6191) to provide for the construction of a sea-level canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the method of construction, and continue the consideration thereof until 4 o'clock p. m., when debate shall cease and a vote be taken upon all amendments then pending or to be offered, and that a vote be taken on the bill before adjournment on that day.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, in consulting with many Senators on both sides, I find that Monday will be more agreeable than Friday. I therefore suggest a change of the day from Friday to Monday, and of the hour from 4 to 3 o'clock, so that the vote will be taken at 3 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I will agree to that, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed agreement as modified?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not desire to object to the modification or to fixing a date. I object, though, to this being taken as an order. That is not the custom of the Senate.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I have asked for unanimous consent.

Mr. TELLER. It should be done by unanimous consent; it is not an order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed agreement will be read as modified.

Mr. TELLER. With that modification I shall not object. Otherwise I do not care anything about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from South Dakota will be again read.

Mr. HOPKINS. It was a request and not an order. It was a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that it is modified to a request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It reads: "It is agreed by unanimous consent." The proposed agreement will be read as modified.

Mr. HALE. I take it that what the Senator offering this proposed agreement had in view was that the language should be clearly understood, so that no question would arise afterwards. It ought to read, rather, "ordered by unanimous consent," because, as the Senator from Colorado says, it can only be done by unanimous consent, and it is only put in the form of an order that nobody may misunderstand the terms of the agreement. I take it that is the design of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. KITTREDGE. That was my purpose, Mr. President.

Mr. TELLER. I have no doubt what the purpose is; but that has never been the form since I have been here. We simply say it is unanimously agreed to do this or to do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Colorado——

Mr. TELLER. And that is usually printed upon the Calendar.

Mr. HALE. That accomplishes the same purpose.

Mr. TELLER. I do not want to have the word "order" used.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Colorado that the word "order" is not used. It reads: "It is agreed by unanimous consent."

Mr. TELLER. That is right.

Mr. HALE. That is right.

Mr. TELLER. I understood the Senator to ask for an order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed agreement?

Mr. HALE. What is the modification?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be again read.

The Secretary read the proposed agreement as modified, as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Monday, June 18, 1906, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 6191) to provide for the construction of a sea-level canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the method of construction, and continue the consideration thereof until 3 o'clock p. m., when debate shall cease and a vote be taken upon all amendments then pending or to be offered, and that a vote be taken on the bill before adjournment on that day.

Mr. SPOONER. Why not put it at 1 o'clock, so that there will be an opportunity for debate of about an hour? That is only a suggestion.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I should like to ask, before this order is entered, of some Senator who is entirely familiar with the subject, whether it is necessary for us to determine at this time the type of the canal, or whether it is possible for this matter to be delayed until those of us who have had no opportunity to do so can familiarize ourselves with the testimony which has been taken?

I wish to say in this connection to Senators, and I say it frankly, that my predisposition has been always in favor of a sea-level canal. That is why I turned from Nicaragua to Panama. But since this controversy has arisen I have had some doubt brought into my mind as to whether I am right in that respect, and I have been undertaking to read the testimony and familiarize myself with the subject, hoping that I might thereby remove the doubt that I have. But if the bill is to be voted upon next Monday, I do not see how I can do that to my own satisfaction. I will not object for one moment to the proposed agreement if it is necessary that it should be settled at this time.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I think that the vote as to the type of the canal could be postponed until the next session of Congress without interfering with the ultimate type that shall be adopted in the construction of the canal. If that should be done, it would allow Senators circumstanced as the Senator from Ohio is to give the same attention to it that those of us who are on the committee have been compelled to do in forming the opinions that we have expressed here on the floor of the Senate.

I will say to the Senator from Ohio that for one I would be very glad to accommodate him or any other Senator similarly situated and permit this question to go over until the first Monday or Tuesday of the next session of this Congress.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FORAKER. I yield the floor.

Mr. TELLER. I think it is thoroughly understood that this measure is not to be touched in the House during the present session. For myself I do not see any object in fixing a date to dispose of it now, though perhaps before the session is over we ought to send it to the House, or perhaps we ought to have sent it earlier in the session. But we certainly can take the balance of the session for debating this question, if we want to do that, without interfering with the final disposition of this case.

I wish myself to make a few remarks upon it this week, because I expect on Saturday to leave the city. I have waited here for some time, supposing that I might get an opportunity to do so to-night, but I see really no opportunity at this late hour to commence a speech on the subject. I do not intend to speak at length, but will be rather brief.

I do not want to object to the proposed agreement, if the Senators who have this measure in charge think it ought to be made, but I do not myself see anything to be gained by it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WARREN. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator unless he is through.

Mr. TELLER. I am through, unless I am going to speak on the bill.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will pardon me, I only want to indorse heartily what he has said. In the multifold duties that we have to discharge in the last part of the session there has scarcely been time since the Interoceanic Canals Committee finished the hearings for us to inform ourselves sufficiently, in my opinion, about the type of canal. If the members of that committee—and they are prominent members, for that matter—think the work can properly proceed without our deciding at this time the type of the canal, then I think by all means we ought to avail ourselves of longer time and better inform ourselves, through the evidence taken by the committee, which we will have time to read and absorb in the meantime.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for a moment?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I think it would be a very wise conclusion to have this matter go over. I have felt that ultimately my views, expressed a few years ago upon the route on which the canal should be built, would be adopted. Every day and every month that this matter has been discussed I at least have been more thoroughly convinced that the position I took at that time is the correct one. I think the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] almost, if not entirely, would agree with me now, and I am sure he regrets that he did not report my resolution favorably from the committee to send expert engineers and contractors down there to investigate the route I then advocated.

I do not want to do anything, Mr. President, to delay the building of the canal or to delay a vote on the pending bill; but I think we will find, as years roll by, that a great mistake is being made.

Mr. HALE. I trust if an agreement is not made, which I understood had been assented to by all parties, fixing the time for a vote upon the bill, the Senator in charge of the bill will insist that unless it is displaced by a vote of the Senate, the consideration shall be continued, and that a vote shall be taken upon it.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President, I do not understand that objection has been made to the modified agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question on the request of the Senator from South Dakota. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. GALLINGER. What is the request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As modified it is proposed that the debate shall cease on Monday next at 3 p. m.

Mr. HOPKINS. I think it is well to fully understand this matter. Personally next Monday is agreeable to me, and I will not delay a vote if the Senate wants to vote upon the bill. The suggestion I made was in answer to the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], and the views concurred in by the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. In my judgment, no advance will be made at all by a vote in the Senate at this session. I understand the situation in the House to be such that if the bill should go there, no action would be taken at this session. If there is any Senator here on either side who feels that he would like to have more time to investigate the subject before the type of the canal is determined, so far as I am personally concerned I would not interpose any objection to the bill going over.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I suggest that if the Senator who has the bill in charge is anxious to fix a time he might fix, perhaps, the middle of next week, and that would give, perhaps, time for discussion, if he feels that he ought to do that.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, with the Senator's permission, I desire to express the personal view that under all the conditions, since no injury to the public business would result from a postponement of the vote until the next session of Congress, the Senate owes to itself and Senators individually should take advantage of the time to cast such a vote upon this momentous question as will comport with their best judgment in the light of a full and clear understanding of all the facts and conditions.

The testimony has been quite voluminous, and it differs, I understand, very materially from the ordinary testimony presented before investigating committees, in that it consists very largely of the opinions, carefully considered, of experts who have examined the conditions upon the ground. I doubt if any Senator will have an abiding sense of satisfaction who casts a vote upon this question without having prosecuted original inquiry to the extent at least of having read the testimony of the experts, the opinions submitted by them from time to time. The experts divided upon the question at almost every point. Men of international reputation as engineers, men of broad experience and great capacity, came to direct issues upon the one question here to be disposed of, to wit, the type of canal.

The experts having divided after inspecting the grounds upon which the work is to be executed, we find that a committee of the Senate, in the light of the testimony of all the experts, again divided upon this subject almost evenly. I believe the bill was reported by a majority of one in favor of a sea-level canal. This Chamber is adorned with maps and plats resulting from long-continued effort and patient study. The physical conditions presented by these maps and plats are elaborately explained by the testimony of the experts under whose guidance the maps and plats were prepared.

There are few Senators in this Chamber not members of the committee who are able to thoroughly and clearly explain the significance at this moment of any one of these charts or maps. I think during the vacation Senators could individually read the testimony, the numerous conflicting opinions, and be prepared to vote upon the question next December in a manner satisfactory to themselves, and, perchance, of much advantage to the country, compared with the present vote.

Mr. HALE. With the provision, I suggest to the Senator, that in the meantime there shall be no work done on the canal until Senators have had ample time to consider it during vacation.

Mr. CARTER. With reference to that suggestion, I understand the statement of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] to be to the effect that work may be prosecuted between now and the 1st of next January without any reference to the particular type of canal to be ultimately determined upon; that excavation may proceed with reference to either a sea-level or lock canal, as proper depth for the lock canal will not be reached at Culebra cut until long after the 1st of next January; that in the time intervening between this and the next session of Congress it will not be necessary to make any preparation whatever for the construction of any locks, on the assumption that a lock canal would be constructed.

In view of the consideration of the matter in Congress, I assume that the Executive, in charge of this work, would not attempt to irrevocably commit the Government to a lock canal or a sea-level canal pending some definite expression by the Congress on the subject.

If it be true that construction may proceed unhindered by a failure to determine definitely at this time the type of canal, then nothing is to be lost by prosecuting the work. It will not be necessary to discontinue excavation, because every yard of material removed will apply alike efficiently to either a lock or a sea-level canal.

The construction of the dams, of course, may not be proceeded with, because I understand from the explanations made in the course of the speeches of Senators, dams are to be constructed at different points dependent upon the type of canal to be constructed.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Colorado yielded to me. I have no right to the floor beyond that.

Mr. TELLER. I do not claim the floor.

Mr. CARTER. Certainly, I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to a paragraph in the message of the President. He says:

> The law now on our statute books seems to contemplate a lock canal. In my judgment a lock canal, as herein recommended, is advisable. If the Congress directs that a sea-level canal be constructed its direction will, of course, be carried out. Otherwise the canal will be built on substantially the plan for a lock canal outlined in the accompanying papers, such changes being made, of course, as may be found actually necessary, including possibly the change recommended by the Secretary of War as to the site of the dam on the Pacific side.

Mr. CARTER. From what message is the Senator reading? What is the date?

Mr. CULBERSON. It is the message from the President of February 19, 1906. I do not know what the President means, or rather, when he contemplates that action shall be taken by Congress. If he means that it ought to be taken now, otherwise he will proceed to construct the canal according to the lock-level plan, then if Congress has a different opinion upon this subject it ought to express it now. If any Senator is authorized to give a more definite expression to what is the purpose of the Administration than is contained in this message, it would be well to have him do it.

Mr. CARTER. Irrespective of the policy announced in the message, we may well take into consideration the fact that under the most favorable estimate as to the time hereafter mentioned, from seven to eight years will be required to build a lock canal. I think it is very clear, if it is contemplated that eight years will be consumed in the entire work, that what is done during the next six months will be equally available at the termination of that period for either a lock or a sea-level canal.

As the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has suggested, it is not contemplated that any agreement will be reached between the respective Houses of Congress at this session with reference to the type of canal. Therefore, the only result will be to take a hasty vote upon immature consideration rather than a vote at a later date after due deliberation and careful study of the record.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me a suggestion there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. The bill reported by the Committee on Intreoceanic Canals is now the unfinished business. It is the only thing in order after 2 o'clock. If the Senator in charge of the bill insists upon the regular order, nothing else can intervene. We can get no postponement unless the Senate by a majority vote displaces this and puts something else in its place. If a majority of the Senate desires to displace this bill and put something else in its place, that does end the matter at this session so far as the Senate is concerned; but the Senator in charge of the bill has a right, and it is his business and his duty, unless the agreement is made as to when a vote shall be taken, to simply call the regular order after 2 o'clock, and unless somebody is ready to debate the bill there must be a vote.

I understand the Senator in charge of the bill to be perfectly willing to agree that on Monday or Wednesday next the vote shall be taken, so that the Senate may decide what it desires shall be done in this matter. But the talk about this going over has no force, because unless the Senate is ready to displace this as the unfinished business it can not go over.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is true.

Mr. HALE. And I notify Senators that unless the Senate does act upon this matter and makes a decision one way or the other, and then leaves it to the other House, the whole matter will come up on the sundry civil appropriation bill, and we shall be for weeks on that bill, debating back and forth because the Senate has not in any way taken action upon the subject. Therefore, it seems to me it is the part of wisdom in good legislation and in help of what everybody wants to draw this matter to an end, that the Senate now agree to fix a time when a vote shall be had upon this subject. Then we shall proceed either to consider this or other matters, and when the day fixed arrives the Senate will pass upon this matter. But if I had charge of the bill, as the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE] has charge of it, I should see that the regular order was called every day after 2 o'clock until a vote was taken.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine has stated a parliamentary situation resulting from the action of the Senate. Even if this bill were not the unfinished business, the Senate could obviously make it so very quickly; and, being the unfinished business, the Senate can quickly displace it.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CARTER. It is a question, therefore, merely as to the will of the Senate concerning the disposition of a matter pending here; and I have expressed but the personal desire, before voting upon this question, to have time to more thoroughly consider it. I am perfectly free to say that the arguments here presented in favor of a sea-level canal have been powerful and well stated out I should not venture to interfere with the existing condition lightly. I believe my vote, if it were cast as I feel now, would be in favor of building a lock canal, whereas, after a mature and careful consideration of the matter, I might change that view; but I should like to have ample time to read the record. It is a matter involving not a trifle—a difference between $250,000,000 and $500,000,000, involving years and years of construction, and involving operation after construction.

Mr. TELLER obtained the floor.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, there are some facts connected with this situation that I think it would be well enough for the Senate to realize. I take it that it is an open secret, known to every member of this body, that the preference of the Executive is for a lock and dam canal. It is known by every one that, in reaching that conclusion, he has not followed the advice of the majority of the experts, whom he very wisely and very properly summoned to his aid. I think I know the Senate well enough to know that it is not in the habit of being frightened from the proprieties that attend the discharge of its duty by public clamor. I think we are warranted in saying that this Chamber is very much given to following out its own conclusions, when deliberately reached, without giving way to any pressure that may be brought to bear either by the press or by the populace of this country. Yet, Mr. President, I do not believe, and I hope that it is not true if it should be charged, as in some quarters it has been charged, that the Senate is too little responsive to public opinion. I think that an unjust and an unfair criticism.

That brings me to say what all of us know, or should know, that in the judgment of the American people the responsibility rests not upon the executive, but upon the legislative branch of this Government to determine the type of this canal. Its construction is the most gigantic piece of work ever undertaken by this Government from its foundation down till now. Whether measured by the dollars and cents involved in the expenditure, or whether judged in its far-reaching effects upon the commerce of the world, the building of this isthmian canal is the most gigantic project that this American people has ever undertaken.

Congress, the legislative branch of the Government, is primarily and finally responsible, not alone for the appropriation of the money, not alone for the passage of the act that made its construction possible, but for the method of that construction and for the type that is to be employed. Say what we will, the American people will say, and the American people will be justified in saying, that if we fail, if the legislative branch of this Government fail to determine the type of this canal, it is because that legislative branch of the Government lacked the courage to meet the responsibility that rested on it.

It is an open secret, known to you and to all of us—and we had as well face it here and now—that if this session of this Congress adjourns the type of that canal is fixed, and fixed by reason of your nonaction. If this session of this Congress closes without action upon your part, that will be a lock-and-dam canal whether the Congress prefer it or not.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is a plea in abatement——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. The inquiry I addressed to Senators who are serving on this committee was calculated to get information on this point. I understand those Senators, however, to agree that this work may progress until we meet here again in December without affecting the question of the type of the canal. I am unwilling to determine the type of the canal by nonaction. If the Senator from Kentucky be right in saying that nonaction be equivalent to voting for a lock canal, then I should feel differently about the matter of fixing a time to take the vote; but it seems to me, in any event, if the Senator from Kentucky will pardon me a moment longer——

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. That next Monday is a very early day, although we are to adjourn within two or three weeks, I suppose, to fix as the time to vote. If we could have this vote taken a little bit later than that, it would give some of us an opportunity to read that which we ought to read, but which we have not yet had an opportunity to read.

When the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN] was making his speech this morning, I noticed he said that General Hains and General Ernst, two very distinguished engineers, were of one opinion, and that Gen. George W. Davis, a man of the highest character and of the greatest ability, and a gentleman in whom I have the greatest confidence, was of a directly opposite opinion. I should like to read, and read with care, the testimony of at least those three men before I am compelled to vote on this very important subject. It does seem to me that to ask us to vote next Monday, when confessedly a majority of the Senators have not had time to read this testimony, is crowding us too much. But I do not want to delay the construction of the canal, and I will do whatever may be necessary to qualify myself to vote intelligently at any time the Senate may see fit to fix. I think nothing is to be lost by determining this matter next December, instead of now; and it seems to me we would all be benefited by an opportunity that would be given by delay to look into this matter and read the testimony.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. KITTREDGE. Will the Senator yield to me just to make a statement?

Mr. BLACKBURN. With pleasure.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I was engaged when the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] made the inquiry which brought forth the statement of the Senator from Kentucky; but I had in mind then, and I submit now, that in a recent interview with the Chief Engineer, Mr. Stevens, he said that, unless Congress acted upon this question at this session, the work would proceed in the construction of a lock canal.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I was coming to that statement of the Chief Engineer.

Mr. President, I am not a member of the committee that reports this bill. I probably have had as little oportunity for complete and full information upon this subject as the average Senator; yet I have looked into it sufficiently to cause me to hold very decided views as to the merits of these two propositions. But that question I do not propose to discuss here and now. It is not for us at this juncture to determine whether the sea-level or the lock and dam canal be the most advantageous. The point to which I was addressing myself was, what seems to me to be the necessity for Congress acting upon this question and determining the type of canal before we shall adjourn and close this session.

It is suggested that if this Congress adjourns and this matter be left in abeyance until next December it will in no wise affect the work to be done between this and that time. It has been suggested by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] that no work to be done between this and December will be lost, misapplied, or wasted, because it will answer as well for the one type of canal as for the other. Who stands sponsor for this statement? The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] tells us that he understands that the committee in charge of the bill are agreed on this condition. I have failed as yet to hear any member of that committee offer a guaranty to the Senate that nonaction at this session will produce no effect upon the final determination of the type to be adopted.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, I will withdraw the statement I made as to the committee being agreed. I made inquiry of members of the committee. One member of the committee answered for the committee, as I understood it, and no member of the committee took any exception to what he said, and so I supposed it was acquiesced in.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I was not criticising the Senator's statement as unwarranted at all.

Mr. FORAKER. But since the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE] has made a different statement, and in view of his statement, I will withdraw what I said.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator from Kentucky permit me?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am trespassing upon the time of the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. TELLER. I yield.

Mr. CARTER. I wish to say to the Senator from Kentucky that my statement was based upon the statement made by the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], a member of the committee.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, will the Senator from Kentucky allow me?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Is it for a question?

Mr. HOPKINS. No; I want to make a statement in connection with what the Senator from Montana has just said; but I will wait until the Senator from Kentucky concludes.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I will be through in a moment. It seems to me that if we should let this question go over undecided it will simply be in the nature of a motion for a continuance. The original proposition that I submitted, and to which I invite the attention of the Senate, is this: Fairly, by any rule that you may lay down, it is not the President of the United States, but it is the Congress of the United States that is properly charged with the responsibility of determining the question of the type of this canal. If that be true, then I go one step further and submit the other suggestion. In the light of the statement of the Chief Engineer himself, just quoted by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE], and in the light of the situation that confronts us, I submit——

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does the Senator from Kentucky expect, if a vote is taken by the Senate on the question of the type of canal, that that question will be settled by the two Houses before the adjournment of Congress?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer the Senator from Illinois. I might answer, and say that I hope so; but I will not stop with that answer; I will go further, and, in answer to the Senator's question, I will say that whether some other body is to act upon this question before adjournment does not affect the obligations that rest upon a Senator.

Mr. HOPKINS. But suppose the other branch of Congress——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Suppose the other branch of Congress adopts the lock-canal plan, and the Senate stands for one proposition and the House for another——

Mr. BLACKBURN. Very well.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does the Senator expect that Congress will remain in session until the two branches of Congress agree upon one type or the other?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer the Senator and say that, as a Senator, I am not responsible for what another House of Congress may do. As a Senator I am responsible for the discharge, and the faithful and intelligent discharge, of the duties that rest upon a member of this Chamber.

Mr. HOPKINS. But, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I should be through in a moment.

Mr. HOPKINS. But give me one moment right there.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Is it a question?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Very well.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is it not just as much the obligation of a Senator, after the Senate has passed upon the type of the canal, to stay here until that type is settled by legislation as it is——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer that question.

Mr. HOPKINS. As it is to vote on the type without knowing what the other branch of Congress will do?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I hope the Senator will at least let me have the privilege of answering one question before piling up others. But I will undertake to answer all of them, if I have time. I will answer the Senator, and say that he will find that I will not be pressing for an adjournment of this Congress until every effort has been made to complete the work that we owe in the matter of fixing the type of canal. Whether we adjourn on the 1st day of July or the 1st day of October does not matter to me. I have stayed here in the Senate Chamber until September and October in continuous session, and I am perfectly willing and ready to do it again before I will make myself fairly amenable to the criticism that the people of this country will have a right to pass upon us if we quit our post without discharging our duty. If it be true that the obligation of fixing the type of canal rests upon the legislative instead of the executive department, and if it be true, as I believe it is true, as I think the American people believe it is true, and as the Chief Engineer of this canal tells you it is true, that an adjournment of Congress without fixing the type of canal, nonaction upon your part, is affirmative action in favor of a lock and dam canal——

Mr. HOPKINS. What is the authority of the Senator for saying that the Chief Engineer has made that statement?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE] told you so. I read it in the press.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have not seen that statement, and I read the newspapers as other Senators do. The Chief Engineer may have made that statement, but I should like to have something definite before it is assumed here in the Senate that the Chief Engineer has made a statement of that kind.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Senator's colleague from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE] told you so.

Mr. HOPKINS. But what is the Senator's authority?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator from Colorado has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I appeal to the Senator from Colorado to allow the Senator from South Dakota who has charge of this bill to submit his proposition to the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. That is what I have been waiting for.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado very courteously yielded me the floor, but it seems that several other Senators are a little jealous of the privileges that that courtesy secured me.

Mr. HALE. I do not think anybody wants to interfere with the Senator. He has put his point very clearly; but really the regular order——

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, is it the province of the Senator from Maine to regulate and limit the extent of the courtesy extended by the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HALE. No; it is the province of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, my vanity almost permits me to conclude that the Senate, or some Senators, are very anxious to have me continue, because I have already stated that if I were left alone I would be through in two minutes by that clock, and I want to quit.

Mr. HALE. Let us see how long the Senator will take in quitting.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Senator from Maine would be more comfortable in his chair. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. I do not want to interfere with the Senator from Kentucky, but I think he and I are trying to secure an agreement about the same thing, namely, to fix a time for a vote.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am sure we are.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, Mr. President, after the very pleasant suggestion made by the Senator from Maine, I am resolved that I will disappoint Senators and I will quit. I only want to add that, for one I am not willing to have the American people complain of a failure of the discharge of a duty as palpable as this appears to me to be. If we do not, if this Chamber does not by a vote before adjournment express its preference as to the type of the canal that is to be constructed, the people will have a right to say—and, in my judgment, the people will say—that we have simply shirked our responsibility, shown ourselves unequal to the duties that devolve upon us, and are at fault. I do not intend to be guilty of that offense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE]? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOPKINS. As modified?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As modified by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. SCOTT. I understood the Senator from Colorado had the floor; and I do not see how the proposition could be accepted without his yielding.

Mr. HALE. He has agreed to it.

Mr. TELLER. I yielded to have this thing settled. I understand it is now settled, and that we will vote on Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. TELLER. I called attention to the fact that it was not likely that any action would be taken by the House, and that it seemed to me we were unduly hastening this matter, when we might vote any time next week, because whether we voted on Monday or Saturday would not make any difference, inasmuch as the House does not intend to take up the bill at the present session. It may be said that we do not know what the other House is going to do; and that was the condition of things some years ago. But to-day, if you know where to inquire, you can find out in advance what the House is going to do or what it is not going to do. The condition is as I stated it, and I think other Senators all know as well as I do that this matter will remain quietly in the House during the remainder of the session.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand that it was announced from the Chair a moment ago that unanimous consent had been given to vote on this bill on next Monday. I want to say to Senators that I did not agree to vote on next Monday. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] was upon the floor, addressing the Senate. He had not quit the floor. I did not know the matter was determined. Other Senators around me were not aware of it. I want to say distinctly and emphatically that I have not agreed, and I do not intend to agree, to vote on the bill on next Monday. Now, I——

Mr. TELLER. I yielded the floor, as is the custom.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask that the request may be again stated, so that we may know whether we are to vote at 3 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. TELLER. It makes no difference whether I yielded the floor or did not, so far as that is concerned. I was not on the floor when the matter was submitted, and I in no wise interfered with the submission of the request. I do not know why the Senator refers to me as having anything to do with it.

Mr. FORAKER. I am not charging the Senator from Colorado with having anything to do with it. The Senator still had the floor. He was being interrupted and was being asked to yield. I did not suppose that in the lull of a moment the request would be submitted and declared agreed to, when disagreement had already been manifested. I do not want to delay this matter, but I am not willing to vote next Monday. I do not know of any necessity for voting so early as Monday. If it could be put off two or three days, it would give a much-needed opportunity to read the testimony. I shall not agree to vote on this measure until I have a chance to look through the testimony given by the distinguished engineers who have been referred to in the speeches made here by Senators on the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair endeavored to state the request so that every Senator would have a chance to object, and the Chair heard no objection, and so stated.

Mr. FORAKER. Senators are familiar with the way in which a great many matters happen here. Just at that particular moment some Senator spoke to me and my attention was diverted for the moment. I did not know there was any such haste about it.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President, I will ask——

Mr. GALLINGER. Let us have order, Mr. President, so that there shall be no further objection after the agreement is made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask that the unanimous-consent agreement be considered open, and that Wednesday afternoon at 3 o'clock be fixed as the time.

Mr. FORAKER. I would rather it would be Thursday, but I will adapt myself——

Mr. KITTREDGE. I will agree to Thursday.

Mr. TELLER (to Mr. KITTREDGE). Give him until Thursday.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I will agree to Thursday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed agreement will be stated.

The SECRETARY. That on Thursday, June 21, 1906, at 3 o'clock, the Senate begin voting on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, if we are going to adjourn this month, as some Senators seem to indicate, and if we postpone the vote until Thursday, expecting, as the Senator from Kentucky seemed to indicate in his speech, that we shall settle the type of the canal at this session, we are giving the other branch of Congress no time whatever to take up this great problem and consider it and debate it and settle it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HOPKINS. As I have said, I am personally——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FORAKER. What is the order?

Mr. HALE. Thursday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is agreed on Thursday, June 21, at 3 o'clock, to begin voting.

Mr. FORAKER. That is, to vote on the bill and all amendments that may be pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. HALE. I submit a privileged report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine presents a conference report, which will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the conference report on the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I raise a question of order. I have not yielded the floor. The Senator from Maine did not ask permission of me.

Mr. HALE. I thought, as the other matter was concluded, that the Senator from Colorado had yielded the floor.

Mr. TELLER. No; I have the floor, and I started in to make a speech.

Mr. HALE. I will withdraw the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was at fault.

Mr. TELLER. I am quite willing to yield, but I want the rule of the Senate followed out. I want the Senator to ask permission of me, and I will yield.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Senator to yield to me to submit two conference reports.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator expect to have action upon them, or does he simply ask that they be read?

Mr. HALE. There is no objection to either one of them. One of the reports is signed by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. I have tried for the last half hour to say something, and if it will convenience the Senate more that I should postpone saying what I have to say until to-morrow, I am perfectly willing to do so.

Mr. HALE. I leave that entirely to the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. I ask unanimous consent that I may suspend now and go on in the morning at the first opportunity; and if the Senator from South Dakota would call up the canal bill early in the morning hour, I think it would be well.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19264) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 37, and 38; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 20, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert the following: "$109,225;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 29, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the last line of said amendment strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 36, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In said amendment strike out the words "and fifty-five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

EUGENE HALE,
S. M. CULLOM,
H. M. TELLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

R. G. COUSINS,
C. B. LANDIS,
H. D. FLOOD,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18750) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4, 9, 34, 35, 38, and 47.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 5, 11, 12, 14, 16, 17, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 48, 49, 50, 53, 54, 57, 58, 59, and 63, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In line 10 of said amendment strike out the colon and insert in lieu thereof a period.

In lines 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15 of said amendment strike out the following: "Provided, That hereafter the pay and allowances of chaplains shall be the same, rank for rank, as is or may be provided by law for officers of the line and of the Medical and Pay Corps, all of whom shall hereafter receive the same pay on shore duty as is now provided for sea duty: And provided further," and insert in lieu thereof as a new paragraph the following:

"That all chaplains now in the Navy above the grade of lieutenant shall receive the pay and allowances of lieutenant-commander in the Navy according to length of service under the provisions of law for that rank, and all chaplains now in the Navy in the grade of lieutenant shall receive their present sea pay when on shore duty: Provided, That naval chaplains hereafter appointed shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of lieutenant (junior grade) in the Navy until they shall have completed seven years of service, when they shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of lieutenant in the Navy; and lieutenants shall be promoted, whenever vacancies occur, to the grade of lieutenant-commander, which shall consist of five members, and when so promoted shall receive the rank, pay, and allowances of lieutenant-commander in the Navy: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be held or construed to increase the number of chaplains as now authorized by law or to reduce the rank or pay of any now serving."

In line 17 of said amendment, commencing with the word "That," have a new paragraph; and in lines 17 and 18 of said amendment strike out the words "pay and;" and in line 21 of said amendment strike out the words "pay and."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In line 4 of said amendment strike out the words "rank, highest;" and in lines 4 and 5 of said amendment strike out the comma after the word "commander" and the words "and of no higher rank;" and in lines 6 and 7 strike out the words "be appointed from civil life in the manner and at" and insert in lieu thereof the word "receive;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In said amendment, after the word "million," strike out the words "three hundred thousand;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 5 of said amendment strike out the words "immediately available and to be;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 36, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the last line of said amendment strike out the comma and the words "to be immediately available;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 51, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 6 of said amendment, after the word "graduation," insert the following: "or that may occur for other reasons;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 52, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lines 4, 5, and 6 of said amendment strike out the following: "therein according to that held by them respectively when so appointed, if such appointees are officers of the Navy, otherwise;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 60, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In said amendment strike out the words "one million" and insert in lieu thereof the words "five hundred thousand;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 61, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 76 of the bill, at the end of line 5, insert the following: "But this provision shall not apply to or interfere with contracts for such armor already entered into, signed and executed by the Secretary of the Navy;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 62, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$33,475,829;" and the Senate agree to the same.

On amendments numbered 2, 6, 7, 13, 32, 33, 37, 55, and 56 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

EUGENE HALE,
GEO. C. PERKINS,
B. R. TILLMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
H. C. LOUDENSLAGER,
ADOLPH MEYER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I did not very attentively listen to the reading of the report. Perhaps if I had I would not have secured the information I desire. I desire to ask the Senator from Maine whether the amendment which was placed in the bill by the Senate in reference to securing information concerning the great battle ship which was provided for has been agreed to or not.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, that is a matter which is left open. The Senate conferees have not by any means yielded, and so far as I know do not propose to yield the Senate amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I trust, Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. As I understand the matter, this refers to the amendment by which this subject is left until the next session for final determination by Congress.

Mr. HALE. The type of the vessel being entirely vague, the Senate adopted an amendment requiring the Secretary to report at the next session a plan in detail. All the more, the Senate agreed to it, because it is so marked a departure that it is understood and admitted by everybody that it will take from now until December to get the plans in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish to add that having taken some interest in this matter, being a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I sincerely trust the conferees on the part of the Senate will insist to the limit on retaining the amendment in the bill.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine if that is the only amendment in disagreement?

Mr. HALE. No; there are other disagreements, but I think this is perhaps the only one which will give rise to a contest.

Mr. WARREN. I wish simply to express the hope that the Senator will insist and continue to insist upon the amendment.

Mr. HALE. So far as I am concerned, I certainly shall.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments, and request a further conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair be authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. HALE, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. TILLMAN.

ADDITIONAL COLLECTION DISTRICT IN TEXAS.

Mr. HOPKINS submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10715) to establish an additional collection district in the State of Texas, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, and 5, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add at the end of section 1 the following: "And the charges for the use of said docks and wharves shall be just and reasonable, and shall not be greater than

LAKE ERIE AND OHIO RIVER SHIP CANAL.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 14396) to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, to define the powers thereof, and to facilitate interstate commerce, if the unfinished business has been disposed of for the day.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I will ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PENROSE. I now call up the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me to make a report from a committee?

Mr. PENROSE. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has no right to yield for that purpose under the rule.

Mr. PENROSE. Then I ask for the consideration of the ship-canal bill.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, when the Senate ceased to consider this bill I had the floor, and I presume I would be expected to go on now; but I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will not insist upon it. I have been here all day long, and am quite weary. The bill can not be finished this evening anyway. I am sure Senators do not want to listen to me at this late hour, and I have as little disposition to be heard at this time. I have been here continuously since 12 o'clock, without any intermission whatever. It would be an imposition upon the Senate, I am sure, for me to attempt to speak now, and it would be disagreeable to me to go on. I am very sure the bill can not be finished this evening. The junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] desires to be heard, and he stated to me that he had conferred with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and that he had consented that it should not be concluded to-night. That being the case, I do not know of any particular advantage to be derived in my proceeding this evening. I do not know that I will have very much to say, and I am very sorry I did not have the opportunity to conclude yesterday. It would hardly be fair to go on at this time.

Mr. PENROSE. Of course I do not desire to inconvenience the Senator from Georgia or the Senate. This bill is third on the Calendar. It is one of very great importance to Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, and twenty-four other States, and the whole country, in my opinion, and it is fairly entitled to early consideration before adjournment. I had hoped that it would be finally disposed of long before this. Still, if the Senator from Georgia makes the request, I will ask unanimous consent——

Mr. BACON. I will say to the Senator that I could have stopped the consideration of the bill at any time yesterday by an objection.

Mr. PENROSE. I know that, and I could also have moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, and I think the Senate would have sustained me.

Mr. BACON. I simply stated that to show I have no disposition to interfere with the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. In view of the additional fact that the Senator thinks his remarks will be brief——

Mr. BACON. I do not make any promise, but I think the Senator will not be disappointed in his expectation.

Mr. PENROSE. Those facts lead me to ask unanimous consent of the Senate that this measure may be considered to-morrow, without interfering with the unfinished business and after it has been temporarily laid aside. I make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent——

Mr. BACON. What time?

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent that the ship canal bill may be considered, without interfering with anyone desiring to speak on the unfinished business, if any Senator does so desire, after the routine morning business is closed and after the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside.

Mr. BACON. I understand that to be after 2 o'clock.

Mr. PENROSE. If there should be an interval before 2 o'clock, I should like to have the bill taken up.

Mr. BACON. I simply wish to say a word. I have sat here the entire day, hardly taking time for a very hasty luncheon, in order that I might be present if the bill came up. I would very much prefer that the Senator should fix it for some time after 2 o'clock, in order that I may not be compelled to devote my entire time to one matter; and I will certainly consent to any arrangement he may desire, if he will make it subsequent to that time.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I suggest that the Senator ask unanimous consent to take it up after the routine morning business.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to make that request, but I am informed that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] desires to address the Senate after the close of the routine morning business upon the isthmian canal measure.

Mr. NELSON. I did not know that.

Mr. PENROSE. I will modify my request, and ask unanimous consent that the measure be taken up after the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside after the hour of 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the bill which is now before the Senate be taken up to-morrow after the unfinished business is laid aside temporarily——

Mr. BACON. And after 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And after the hour of 2 o'clock. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ARTILLERY OF THE UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3923) to reorganize and to increase the efficiency of the artillery of the United States Army, to report it with amendments.

Mr. President, I ask permission to say a few words.

I want to invite the early and careful consideration of Senators to the provisions of the bill, not with the intention of taking it up and disposing of it at this session, but so that Senators may be ready to assist the Military Committee and, for that matter, the country to unravel and reform somewhat a regrettable tangle.

According to the so-called "Endicott Board," the United States Government has been for a number of years appropriating and expending annually large amounts of money on our coast defenses. Every emplacement and gun put in position requires attention after its installment, and if we are ever called upon to use this arm of defense, we must have skilled artillerymen, machinists, electricians, and others trained in the service.

Now, while we have expended and appropriated these large amounts of money, and are going forward from day to day in the expenditure of still further sums, we are not furnishing artillerymen and others to man the guns and to care for them, and the result is that about one-half of our defenses are manless, motionless, and, as a consequence, worthless in case of sudden attack. The best that can now be done for the guns mentioned is to oil, wax, cover with canvas, and bid them good-by. We are installing expensive systems of searchlights, range finders, and a thousand and one modern improvements, all requiring expert knowledge of handling and careful laborious labor in protecting. And yet we have no more skilled men and pay no higher compensation than we used to when we used the obsolete smoothbore muzzle-loading guns and had but few in position. The situation is becoming well-nigh intolerable, and we must, in ordinary decency, in the performance of our public duties either discontinue further appropriations and box up or sack up a part of our present armament, or we must increase the artillery branch of the Army.

In 1901 we added to the duties of the artillery the torpedo defenses, submarine mines, etc., formerly in charge of the engineers; but we have not provided the men or money to care for these, and this adds to the embarrassment and demoralization.

The War Department is, in all its branches, a unit in urging the addition of about 6,000 men to the artillery branch, and also in advancing the pay of certain skilled electricians, engineers, etc., in the artillery. The Military Committee of the Senate is a unit in the support of this increase, but, Mr. President, there are members of the committee who desire to investigate further the practicability of decreasing some other branch of the service in providing for this increase, and the cavalry has been mentioned as the proper arm to be diminished.

I think we should not reduce any other branch, and a majority of the committee share this opinion. Every member, however, of the committee is free, as is every member of this body, to take up and discuss this subject upon its merits, and I earnestly entreat the Congress to give early attention and relief.

I should like to have every Senator make it his business to look into the subject, so that at an early day in the next session we may take up the whole subject and dispose of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

LANDS AND FUNDS OF OSAGE INDIANS, OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Mr. LONG. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15333) for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes. I called it up the other day, and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] asked that it be laid over in order to make some examination. He has withdrawn his objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

Mr. LONG. I renew the request I made the other day, that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that committee amendments be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, in section 1, page 2, line 25, after the words "of the," to strike out "introduction of this bill in the House of Representatives, namely, February 21, 1906," and insert "approval of this act;" so as to read:

We bless Thee, O God, our heavenly Father, for the spirit of '76 which moved our fathers to high and holy resolves, illustrious deeds, and glorious achievements, which gave to us a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, and for the old flag which they carried to victory on a thousand fields of battle, dear to every American heart, emblem of liberty and freedom, law and order, peace and good will. God grant that it may wave on in triumph until every people of every clime shall feel its influence and rest secure in their sacred rights under its graceful and protecting folds, and Thine be the praise through Jesus Christ our Lord. CLERK FOR COMMITTEE ON IRRIGATION.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a privileged resolution (No. 435), which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands is hereby authorized to appoint a clerk to said committee, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $2,000 per annum from and after July 1, 1906, unless otherwise provided for by law; and the Committee on Appropriations is hereby authorized and directed to provide for the salary of said clerk in one of the general appropriation bills: Provided, That the same shall be in lieu of the session clerk assigned to said committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. PAYNE. I think it had better go over for the day. I will object for to-day.

The SPEAKER. For the present the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] objects.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire, if the Chair will hear me a moment, to say a word in reference to the privileged character of this resolution. The resolution, or a part of it, provides for the payment out of the contingent fund for a certain fixed period, and that makes it privileged, Mr. Speaker. Reports from the Committee on Accounts, which provide for payment of sums out of the contingent fund under the rules of the House, are privileged reports, and resolutions can be called up as privileged which thus provide. The present resolution provides that it shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House "at the rate of $2,000 per annum from and after July 1, 1906, unless otherwise provided for by law."

It has been the uniform custom in the House, when resolutions of this kind have been reported from the Committee on Accounts and passed by the House, for the Committee on Appropriations to provide for them in one of the appropriation bills. Mr. Speaker, from a number of rulings of the Chair, resolutions of this sort from the Committee on Accounts, passed by the House, have been held time and time again to be existing law, which would authorize the Committee on Appropriations to make provision for them in an appropriation bill and not violate Rule XXI.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman is correct in his statement, that it has been so held and is existing law, of course that takes away the privilege of the resolution, for it provides that hereafter the Committee on Appropriations is directed to make this appropriation. The resolution makes law. If it does, of course it takes away the privilege of the resolution.

Mr. BARTLETT. Not at all, Mr. Speaker; a resolution which provides simply for this clerk to be paid out of the contingent fund is existing law. If I had the House Manual at hand, I think I might readily call the attention of the Chair to certain decisions. If the appropriation was only made for the sessions of Congress, under the rules of the House we could provide that the sum be paid out of the contingent fund until otherwise provided for; and then it would be existing law, and I apprehend that the Committee on Appropriations could make provision if that latter clause was not in the resolution. I think it is privileged, Mr. Speaker; but if it is not, then I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he strike from the resolution that part which it is suggested renders the resolution not privileged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that a nonprivileged provision in a privileged resolution vitiates the whole resolution. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from Georgia to the language of this resolution:

Is hereby authorized to appoint a clerk to said committee, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $2,000 per annum from and after July 1, unles otherwise provided by law; and the Committee on Appropriations is hereby authorized and directed to provide for the salary of said clerk in one of the general appropriation bills: Provided, That the same shall be in lieu of the session clerk assigned to said committee.

Now, it seems that there is a session clerk assigned to said committee under the law and under the rules, but that assignment is silent.

Mr. BARTLETT. He has already been provided for by the Appropriations Committee.

The SPEAKER. Precisely; but this substitutes an annual clerk for a session clerk. Two things are accomplished. Now, the Chair will be inclined to hold that the grant of $2,000 to this session clerk for the coming fiscal year, or pay at that rate for the remainder of the Congress from the contingent fund would be in order under the rules, because expenditures from the contingent fund are privileged. But it goes further, and provides what the Committee on Appropriations is authorized to do; and it does seem to the Chair that that vitiates the privileged character of the resolution.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I invoked the ruling of the Chair in order that we might have it for the guidance of the committee in the future as we have a number of resolutions that contain this provision.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is quite aware that under the practice of the House resolutions of this character have been reported and passed, but that is where the point has not been made, and the Chair can not rule without the point of order is made.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand that; but I wanted the ruling for the guidance of the committee.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker Carlisle did rule on a question of this same kind, and I might refer the Chair to that ruling.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not advised of that ruling; on the contrary there may possibly be one. The Chair would have very great respect for a ruling made by Mr. Speaker Carlisle on what would be construed as a precedent, but the Chair does not say that it would necessarily control the matter. Has the gentleman any further resolutions?

Mr. CASSEL. They are all of the same character of the one that we have already called up.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman withhold his motion just a moment?

Mr. TAWNEY. I withhold the motion.

BRIDGE ACROSS TENNESSEE RIVER AT CHATTANOOGA, TENN.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bridge bill—H. R. 20070.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Chattanooga Northern Railway Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Tennessee, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto for railway and other purposes across the Tennessee River at Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

On motion of Mr. MOON of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of Arizona and New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan calls up a conference report on the following bill——

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether that report is liable to provoke a protracted debate?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know.

Mr. HAMILTON. I do not understand that it is likely to provoke a long debate. I have conferred with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] in relation to it, and I understand that there will be no protracted debate. I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed at the Clerk's desk that there has been no message from the Senate on this subject, and that we have not the original papers.

Mr. HAMILTON. Then I will call up the report later.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19844—the sundry civil appropriation bill—with Mr. WATSON in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

For gauging the streams and determining the water supply of the United States, and for the investigation of underground currents and artesian wells, and the preparation of reports upon the best methods of utilizing the water resources, $100,000.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph just read, that it changes existing law, that there is no authority of law for the appropriation that is carried in the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. MONDELL. I should like to be heard briefly on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday a point of order was made against certain language in the first paragraph on page 75. Later the point of order was withdrawn as relating to a portion of the paragraph and retained as to the provision "for gauging streams and determining the water supply." In the discussion on the point of order made against the paragraph but little attention seems to have been paid to the portion of the paragraph against which the point of order was finally insisted upon. And in view of the fact that there was but little discussion directly on that point, I desire to discuss the subject very briefly. I hold, Mr. Chairman, that the work contemplated by the paragraph against which the point of order is made is provided for in existing law, and that it is provided for by three different and distinct provisions of existing law, namely, by that provision of law providing for the classification of public lands, and contained in lines 5 and 6, page 77 of the bill; second, that it is provided for in the language providing for the examination of the mineral resources of the United States, contained in lines 6 and 7, page 77, and that further this work is provided for by legislation enacted in 1888, specifically referring to this class of investigation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as regards that feature of the work of stream gauging and study of underground waters which relates to the classification of the public lands. The public lands are classified into agricultural, mineral, grazing, and forest. In the arid and semiarid regions of the United States the agricultural character of the lands can only be determined by a study of the surface and underground water supply. It would be utterly impossible for the members of the Geological Survey to classify or designate agricultural lands in the arid and semiarid regions without a knowledge of the flow of streams and of the facts as to underground water resources. In strictly arid territory land must be irrigable to be properly classed as agricultural. Its irrigation depends upon the flow of streams, both their volume during the irrigation season and the uniformity of the flow year after year. Without a knowledge of the facts relating to the flow of streams it would be utterly impossibe for the Survey to classify and designate the agricultural lands of the arid region, as those charged with the duty of classifying the land would have no means of knowing whether the land was agricultural or not without a study of the water supply, which alone makes them agricultural.

In the arid region the available water supply marks the only difference between agricultural and nonagricultural lands in many instances. Their agricultural character is not a question of the richness of the soil, but of the water supply, and areas lying side by side, with the same soil structure, with the same chemical composition—one may be agricultural and the other nonagricultural or grazing, depending upon the water available for irrigation, and this must be determined by the gauging of the streams.

Now, as regards the nonmineral, semiarid lands, they are either agricultural, grazing, or irredeemable desert, depending on the existence or absence of underground waters at reasonable depth. They can not be advantageously used for grazing purposes even, in the absence of flowing streams, unless there be underground water sufficiently near the surface that it can be raised by pumps or windmills for stock. Neither can such lands be used for agriculture under irrigation where there are no flowing streams unless there be sufficient underground water available for such purposes. So that there can be no classification of lands as provided for by law, as the Survey is commanded to classify, without a study and investigation of the flow of streams and of the presence of underground waters.

Second, Mr. Chairman, this investigation, this stream gauging, this study of underground waters is provided for by the language of the statute which provides for the examination of the mineral resources of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, it is a well-known fact that water is a mineral; that in many districts it is by far the most valuable of all minerals; that in many regions it is the only mineral that exists in any considerable quantity or of any considerable value. If there be any question in the mind of the Chair as to the mineral character of water, I refer the Chair to the highest authorities in America on the subject of mineralogy, Profs. E. S. and James D. Dana.

Prof. E. S. Dana, in his Text-Book of Mineralogy, page 1, states:

Finally, mineral species are, as a rule, limited to solid substances; the only liquids included being metallic mercury and water.

Prof. James D. Dana, in his Manual of Mineralogy and Petrography, page 1, states:

Water is a mineral, but generally in an impure state from the presence of others minerals in solution.

The Century Dictionary defines a mineral as—

Any constituent of the earth crust; more specifically an inorganic body occurring in nature, homogeneous and having a definite chemical composition.

The Standard Dictionary, in its definition of mineral has this statement:

Water is a mineral that solidifies at 32° Fahrenheit.

Now, Mr. Chairman, authorities could be cited at great length on this question, but I assume that there can be no question the mind of the Chair as to the mineral character of water. I I have never heard that proposition seriously controverted or disputed.

When the Congress provided for the examination of geological structure and mineral resources and organized a bureau, which up to that time had been carrying on the work of geological survey, hydrographic, or water survey, the Congress understood that in providing for an examination of mineral resources it provided for the examination of that mineral, among others, which in many regions is by far the most important and valuable of all, to wit, water, and this Survey did for a number of years investigate the water resources of the United States without this specific provision for gauging of streams.

Moreover, many important mineral regions depend for their value upon the existence or development of water supply for the miners and their processes. As an illustration, one of the richest and most extensive placer regions in the United States, in western Arizona, known as the "Plomosa," has been only slightly developed on account of the lack of water, which is hauled a long distance for domestic purposes, and the gold is obtained by the use of dry washers. It is possible that underground waters can be developed or storm waters stored in the vicinity. Also, it may be possible to develop the water supply on Bill Williams Fork and supply water from the Colorado River to this region. On the solution of the water problem of this region depends the development of placers known to contain hundreds of millions of dollars in gold.

Knowledge of stream flow, to be reliable, must extend over a long series of years and must be continuous. The fluctuations of climate, particularly in the arid region, are such that there is a very great difference between the flow of the wettest year and the driest year, both of which must be known to permit a proper and economical development. The wettest year must be known in order that proper provision may be made against destructive floods, and the driest year must be known in order that the development may not proceed beyond a certain water supply.

It is important to have, not only the maximum, minimum, and mean discharge of every stream which is to be used, but it is equally important to know at what intervals minimum years are to be expected. If they occur at long intervals, it may be feasible to provide for them by reserve storage from wet years, but if they occur at short intervals, or several of them in succession, this may not be feasible.

Proper hydrographic investigation can be successfully carried on only by specialized men, and if the work is suddenly stopped, the force will become scattered, and the value of work already done will be largely lost, owing to the break in the record. It will require years to again build up an organization of equal efficiency, and the result will be that a large number of short records will be in existence with a gap so wide as to render the former records of little value.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that this appropriation was never carried in any appropriation bill prior to 1894, and in that appropriation, which was only $12,500, the area within which it could be expended was limited to the arid and semiarid sections of the country? It has not, therefore, always been carried since we have had a Geological Survey in an appropriation bill, as stated by the gentleman. It was a special appropriation.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think I stated that when no specific appropriation was carried in the language of the present bill the work was carried on, and it was carried on under the authority granted for the classification of lands and the investigation of the mineral resources of the country, and the specific item was only placed in the bill, I call to the attention of the Chairman, when the Committee on Appropriations insisted on having this lump-sum appropriation divided and its various uses specified. In order that there might be no question as to the portion of the appropriation that was used for the examination of water resources this language was inserted in the bill for carrying on the work provided for by law.

It was upon the insistence of the committee that every separate class of work carried on under the appropriation should be specified, that the appropriation should be separated, so that the committee might know for what particular and specific purpose the appropriation was being used—what part of it was being used for the examination of minerals in general, what part of it was being used for the examination of this particular mineral, what part of it was being used for the classification of lands by surveys.

But, Mr. Chairman, beyond all that, this work is provided for by special statute, so far at least as the arid and semiarid regions of the country are concerned; and I call the attention of the Chairman particularly to the joint resolution of March 20, 1888. That is law; that it is law no one will deny; that it has never been repealed is not questioned, and whatever is provided for in that resolution can be appropriated for in this bill and not be subject to a point of order.

That resolution recites as follows:

> That the Secretary of the Interior, by means of the Director of the Geological Survey, be, and he is hereby, directed to make an examination of that portion of the arid regions of the United States where agriculture is carried on by means of irrigation, as to the natural advantages for the storage of water for irrigating purposes, with the practicability of constructing reservoirs, together with the capacity of the streams and the cost of construction and capacity of reservoirs, and such other facts as bear on the question of storage of water for irrigating purposes; and that he be further directed to report to Congress as soon as practicable the result of such investigation.

I call the attention of the Chair to this language in the resolution particularly, "together with the capacity of the streams," etc. I have no doubt but that the Chair has the resolution before him. That is the law, Mr. Chairman. That is the law providing for the examination of the capacity of streams within the arid and semiarid regions and on the public domain. That has never been repealed, and in the sundry civil bill of October 2, 1888, this work was extended. It may be said that an item carried in the appropriation bill is not necessarily continuing law, but I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the provisions in the appropriation bill of October 2, 1888 (25 Stat., 526), contains this provision, which is continuing law:

> That the Director of the Geological Survey, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, shall make a report to Congress on the first Monday in December of each year, showing in detail how this money has been expended, etc.

This is with reference to the appropriation for the examination of the waters of the arid region and of the public lands. Later, by legislation, which I can not now turn to, provision was made that thereafter all reports relative to the gauging of streams and to examination into the water resources of the country should be published in a certain form, both of these acts being continuing law.

So, Mr. Chairman, this item is provided for, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, by three separate provisions of law: First, that providing for the classification of lands; second, that providing for the examination of the mineral resources of the country; third, by the joint resolution of 1888 and legislation following, specifically authorizing the expenditure herein provided for. And the chairman of the committee makes no argument against all this by saying that for some years this particular language was not used in the appropriation bills, because we all know that this work has been carried on from the organization of the Survey, was carried on before the present organization of the Survey. That the hydrographic branch of the Geological Survey has always been one of its most important branches is beyond question, and when the language objected to was not in the bills work was carried on under the provision of law which authorized the classification of lands and the examination of the mineral resources of the country as a necessary part of such classification and examination.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. In discussing the fact that this appropriation is carried and authorized by the organic law constituting the bureau, the Geological Survey, I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that of course the only distinction between water and any other mineral is the fact that it is volatile and fluid at a given temperature, and that also iron is volatile at one temperature and liquid at another, and solid at another, and it is simply a question of temperature. Water is just as much a mineral as corrundum or anything else.

Mr. MONDELL. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. He is quite right. No one can successfully deny that.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Wyoming permit a suggestion to the gentleman from Colorado? I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that on page 471 of the hearings he will find the purposes for which this appropriation is used, and then I ask him whether it has any reference whatever to minerals.

> The development of water powers has been most important in the Appalachian region of the South, but even as far north as Maine there has been great activity. Investors and engineers have sought for every scrap of information upon which they could base plans for larger utilization of the waters that were running to waste.

That is the language of Mr. Walcott in his detailed statement of the purposes for which this appropriation is expended. It did not relate to water at all.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that disproves that water is a mineral by any possibility. The question as to how a mineral may be used does not in any manner affect the facts. Mineral oil, naphtha, benzine, and kerosene are used for the same purpose, for water power, that water is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that, this being a discussion of the point of order, rests in the discretion of the Chair. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair does not like to shut gentlemen off if they desire to ask questions or discuss the proposition, but the Chair is entirely satisfied on this proposition, and desires to state that further argument is useless, so far as the question at issue is concerned.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana one question—that is, if a limitation limiting the place where this appropriation is to be expended in that portion of the country west of the one hundredth meridian would meet the objection which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] makes in reference to water power in the Appalachian region.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think not. I understand that the reclamation act has practically provided for the gauging of water courses and the whole water question in the arid and semiarid regions. I do not think it answers the question at all.

The CHAIRMAN. On yesterday the Chair in an elaborate discussion took up the identical proposition presented by the point of order this morning. On page 75 the questions having reference to the "gauging of streams and determination of the water supply" were identical with those on which the point of order is now raised. The Chair, after having carefully examined existing law on the subject, together with the joint resolution to which the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] this morning called the Chair's attention, decided at that time that, in the opinion of the Chair, it was subject to the point of order. And, for the reasons then stated, without again elaborating or repeating, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MONDELL. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 37.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wyoming that it is not in order to amend the paragraph, because the paragraph is out.

Mr. MONDELL. My amendment is not to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

After the word "treasury," line 2, page 77, insert "For measuring the capacity of streams in accordance with the joint resolution of March 20, 1888, $100,000."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point against the proposed amendment, that it is supposed to be an amendment to a paragraph that was passed some time ago—the preceding paragraph—and that it changes existing law. There is no authority of law for an appropriation carried in the amendment. The amendment proposed is to amend the paragraph to the preceding one that went out on the point of order, and that was passed when we took up the reading of this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman want to be heard on that?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment was offered not as an amendment to the preceding paragraph, but following the preceding paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think that the gentleman can not offer it as an amendment, because it does not seem to amend anything. If the gentleman desires to offer it as a substitute to the paragraph that was stricken out, it will be in order to do so.

Mr. MONDELL. That was my intention, Mr. Chairman. I simply provided that my amendment should follow a certain word, that word being the last word of the preceding paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph has been stricken out that has reference to this subject.

Mr. MONDELL. I offer it as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers it as a new paragraph.

Mr. MONDELL. I offer it as a new paragraph. I do not care to take the time of the House now on the point of order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I would like to know in what shape the proposition is now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has offered as a separate paragraph the proposition which was read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is a material change, and I think it ought to be reported, so that we may know in what shape it is.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report it as a new paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new paragraph the following:
"And for measuring capacity of streams, in accordance with the joint resolution of March 20, 1888, $100,000."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I make the point of order that that is a change of existing law. There is no authority of law, as a matter of fact, for the appropriation carried in the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Wyoming to the fact that there has been a repeal of that joint resolution, or part of that joint resolution: I think it was in 1890. I have sent for the book. It was repealed by necessary implication by the reclamation act, because that covered the whole subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point or order?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman thinks it has been repealed. Possibly it has. I have searched diligently, and I have found no statute repealing it, either directly or by implication; nothing whatever. It is true that later the further exension of this work was provided for in an appropriation bill, and that further extension was somewhat modified by a repeal of the statute, but there has been no law repealing, directly or indirectly, the provisions of the joint resolution of March 20, 1888. The contention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] that it was repealed directly or by implication by the national reclamation act is not sound, in my opinion. There is nothing in the national reclamation act repealing, directly or indirectly, this resolution. This resolution does not provide solely for the investigation of water resources in the interest of irrigation. It provides for a general investigation of the capacity of streams; and, Mr. Chairman, my amendment is simply to carry out the provisions of the joint resolution of March 20, 1888.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I have sent for the Statutes at Large, volume 26, which, I think, contains the repealing law. But aside from that, however, I wish to say this amendment the gentleman has offered is contained here in some literature prepared by the Geological Survey and sent to Members of the House, which reads as follows——

Mr. MONDELL. I received a considerable amount of the information I have given the House from the Geological Survey; I admit that, and it is sound and safe doctrine.

Mr. TAWNEY (reading):

That the Secretary of the Interior, by means of the Director of the Geological Survey, be, and he is hereby, directed to make an examination of that portion of the arid regions of the United States where agriculture is carried on by means of irrigation as to the natural advantages for the storage of water for irrigating purposes with the practicability of constructing reservoirs, together with the capacity of the streams and the cost of construction and capacity of reservoirs, and such other facts as bear on the question of storage of water for irrigating purposes; and that he be further directed to report to Congress as soon as practicable the result of such investigation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the irrigation act, by implication at least if not directly, entirely wipes out this joint resolution, because it expressly provided for the doing of everything which the Secretary of the Interior was directed to do under this joint resolution. There is no authority, therefore, for the expenditure of the money under this resolution, because the resolution has been supplemented and thereby, by implication, repealed.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman thinks that there has been a repeal of this joint resolution. I do not believe there has been any repeal, directly or indirectly, of its provisions.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will ask the gentleman from Wyoming, who is thoroughly familiar with the law and the country in which this reclamation is going on under the reclamation act, has any work been done under this joint resolution?

Mr. MONDELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know as to that, except that the very work we are trying to continue has, so far as the arid region is concerned, been authorized under that resolution.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would like to ask the gentleman another question. Has the Secretary of the Interior ever reported in compliance with this joint resolution?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman will have to ask the Secretary.

Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that not only has this joint resolution never been repealed or modified, directly or indirectly, but my paragraph does not seek to put in operation all of the provisions of this joint resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman a question. This provides:

That the Secretary of the Interior, by means of the Director of the Geological Survey, be, and he is hereby, directed to make an examination—

Of certain portions of the United States—and that he be further directed to report to Congress as soon as practicable the result of such investigation.

Was such a report ever made by the Secretary of the Interior to Congress pursuant to that joint resolution?

Mr. MONDELL. There have been a number of reports made on these general subjects, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to this resolution?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know that there has ever been a complete report made under this resolution. In fact, I do not know whether any report was ever made under the resolution. I assume there was no complete report, and I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that by this amendment I simply provide for the measurement of the capacity of streams, as provided for by this resolution. I do not seek to put in operation any of the other provisions of the resolution, or to provide for carrying out any of the work provided for in the resolution, save the measuring of streams. Now, Mr. Chairman, the reclamation law does not provide for any stream measurements except in connection with irrigation projects under examination; on the contrary, it prohibits any measurements or investigations anywhere except in connection with projects which the Secretary of the Interior contemplates constructing under the reclamation law. Private companies are irrigating lands, farmers are irrigating lands, settlers, far from flowing streams in the western country are irrigating lands, where the depth of the water below the surface is not so great as to make it impracticable to raise it by wind mills and other cheap power, and this investigation is necessary, outside of the field occupied by the Reclamation Service, for the benefit of farmers, intending settlers, purchasers of the Government lands, of which 365,000,000 acres remain on the market in the arid region.

The CHAIRMAN. The new paragraph offered by the gentleman from Wyoming was read, as follows:

For measuring the capacity of streams, in accordance with the joint resolution of March 20, 1888, $100,000.

Recourse must therefore be had to the joint resolution of 1888 in order to determine the meaning of the proposition of the gentleman from Wyoming. That resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior, by means of the Director of the Geological Survey, be, and he is hereby, directed to make an examination of that portion of the arid regions of the United States where agriculture is carried on by means of irrigation, as to the natural advantages for the storing of water for irrigating purposes, with the practicability of constructing reservoirs, together with the capacity of the streams, and the cost of construction and capacity of reservoirs, and such other facts as bear on the question of storage of water for irrigating purposes; and that he be further directed to report to Congress as soon as practicable the result of such investigation.

It will be seen from this joint resolution that it is not in any sense a continuing law, but merely a direction to the then Secretary of the Interior to make certain investigations and report as soon as practicable. Now, if the then Secretary, or any Secretary of the Interior since that time, has not reported, a resolution requiring him to report might be in order, possibly, under this joint resolution; but the gentleman from Wyoming does not seek to do that by this paragraph. He seeks to make it a continuing law under this joint resolution, which is not a continuing law, but which is only a resolution directed to the then Secretary of the Interior to do a certain thing.

The Chair therefore thinks very clearly that the new paragraph is subject to the point of order as being new legislation. The Chair sustains the point.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GROSVENOR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disgreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of Arizona and New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4806) to regulate the landing, delivery, cure, and sale of sponges.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the continuation of the investigation of the structural materials of the United States (stone, clays, cements, etc.), under the supervision of the Director of the United States Geological Survey, to be immediately available, $50,000.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph just read. I make that point based on the fact that the original appropriation for that purpose did not contemplate that it would be a continuing work, and even if it did, its termination was specially provided for by the wording of the appropriation made for that purpose last year, which was for the continuation and completion on or before July 1, etc.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, the point of order is made against five lines included in lines 8 to 12 on page 77 of the bill, and relates to the investigation of the structural material of the United States—stone, clay, cement, etc.

On yesterday, Mr. Chairman, I undertook to claim that the Appropriation Committee ought to be taken at its word. It ought to be taken that it had investigated the subject about which they propose to legislate, and this brings us sharply to the same question. Line 8 begins "for the continuation of the investigation of structural materials of the United States," etc. The Appropriation Committee in its hearings ascertained what was necessarily true, that this work was going on, and in its preparation of the bill used appropriate language when it said "for the continuation of the investigation of structural material."

Now, Mr. Chairman, if that is true, unless the Appropriation Committee is mistaken, the point of order is not well taken against this paragraph in the bill. No one will dispute, I think, the fact that this matter of investigation of structural material is going on. If dispute was made, I think I could find testimony in support of it in the hearings and in the recommendations and statements made by the different officers of the Government. The work was taken up, Mr. Chairman, largely at St. Louis, in connection with the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, and it was continued there with facilities that were furnished, demonstrating that it was not the work of a day but a work that took a great deal of time to complete. You can not make an investigation in a day; it was not a mere chemical analysis; it involves various tests as to strength and resistance and the plant necessarily had to be constructed for the purpose of carrying on the investigation. And wherever else anything was done in that direction in the United States it required the same preparation and the same plant.

But, Mr. Chairman, in a document that was sent to the Senate and ordered published February 12, 1906—Senate Document 214—we find some reference to the matter. A resolution was passed on the 26th of January, 1906, by the Senate, calling on the Secretary of the Interior to transmit a summary of the results obtained in the investigation, under the direction of the Geological Survey, of fuels and structural materials at the testing plant at St. Louis, and a statement of his opinion and the reasons therefor, whether or not it is desirable for the Government to continue the investigation, giving an estimate of the amount of money which would be necessary to carry on the investigation in a satisfactory manner during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1906.

I read now from the Secretary's report in response thereto:

I transmit herewith a copy of a letter from the Director of the Geological Survey, embodying the report called for in the above-mentioned resolution, and have the honor to state that, in my judgment, the investigation of fuel and structural materials heretofore authorized by the Congress should be continued, and an appropriation of $350,000, as estimated by the Director of the Geological Survey, be made for that purpose.

Now, I could go through, if it did not weary the Chair and committee, the letter of February 3, 1906, by the Director of the Geological Survey, and show therefrom that the proposed investigation should be continued, as it is now being carried on. In speaking of the matter of investigation, he speaks of fuel investigations and other investigations, and says:

During the current fiscal year various investigations are being conducted in St. Louis on the same site that was used during 1904. The equipment has been enlarged by the purchase of the necessary instruments, machinery, and by the construction of storage bins, conveyors, and other facilities for handling coal. The object of the investigation indicated in the wording of the act the analyzing and testing of coal, lignites, and other fuel substances in order to determine their fuel value. The class under investigation now is the one relating to structural material.

Further on in this letter it will be found that he referred specially to this. In the same letter it is said that the Geological Survey has entered on the conduct of the investigation of the fuel and structural materials in response to a general public demand for information rather than any theoretical consideration. I read from page 8 of the report. This is what is stated:

During the years 1902, 1903, and 1904 the Survey conducted a series of examinations of materials suitable for the manufacture of cement foundations in different parts of the country, and these examinations have already resulted in important industrial developments. During this year, and especially during 1904 and 1905, the need of more extended investigations into the most efficient methods of utilizing the cements and other structural materials has become continually more apparent.

So that this plant that has been established, this work that goes on—whether you call it public work or whether you call it an object, it is quite immaterial—the rule of this House would admit it properly as an appropriate——

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much to do it, but I am compelled, in order to save time, to call attention to the fact that the gentleman is not speaking to the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The difficulty is with his own mind. I am trying to demonstrate, and just now stated, that we have a plant where we are continuing now to do, according to the statement of the Secretary of the Interior and the Director of the Geological Survey, this very work. It is going on at present, and nobody denies it. These officers know, and when the gentleman says that has nothing to do with the question, he seems to have awakened from a dream. The question is whether we may strike this down under a point of order when it is a matter that is continuing. We may make appropriations under a paragraph of Rule XXI of this House for a continuation of public works or objects already in progress.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question or two for the information of the Chair, in order that the Chair may rule intelligently upon the point of order. The Chair will ask the gentleman this: This item reads "for the continuation of the investigation of structural materials of the United States." Does the gentleman believe that the word "of" is used in its possessive sense—that is, the structural material belonging to the United States—or is it used in the sense of containing, that is to say, in the United States?

Mr. KEIFER. In the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. In the whole United States?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; and that is what has been going on, except where we have specially provided otherwise by law in this bill. If the Chair will pardon me, I will call the attention of the Chair to the fact that he will find on page 88 the question of testing materials for the United States provided for under the head of the Watertown Arsenal tests.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that. Secondly, the Chair desires to ascertain whether or not these investigations that have been provided for in previous appropriations of this character and under this language in this appropriation bill are for private parties, for corporations, or for the United States Government.

Mr. KEIFER. They are for the benefit of the people of the United States. They are not for private parties. I understand that this plant that was established at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition was a place where they invited people who had materials, not only in the State of Missouri, but all over the country, to send the material to be investigated and to be tested, and those materials were tested not for a corporation, but for the purpose of determining the value of the materials generally that we might utilize in work in public buildings.

The CHAIRMAN. But whose coal and structural material was there examined? Was it material belonging to the United States, taken from the United States domain, or was it material belonging to private individuals in different parts of the country?

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I am not able to answer every question that may be asked; but my understanding is that the material was sent there without cost to anybody, some getting it from one place and some from another. It was for the purpose of testing cement, stone, iron, and those very things that enter into our buildings, for the public buildings all over the country, the public buildings here, and other structures, and so on; and it was not made because it belonged to the United States particularly, but it was United States material. Now, it is said by the gentleman who makes the point of order that the appropriation last year was to complete a work; but the committee comes here, the distinguished chairman reporting the bill, and asks for an appropriation to continue the work that began in years before, and he expresses himself aptly through the bill in that way. I am trying to stand by the bill of the committee. I do not care to attack it on the side after it has been reported by the committee. I am here to defend the committee, and insist that it used appropriate language when it made this appropriation for the continuation of the investigation of the structural material.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word or two on this point of order. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] makes the point of order that there is no existing law under which this appropriation can be made, because the last bill said that the appropriation was made to complete a certain line of tests. I want to call the attention of the Chair and of the committee to the fact that the Agricultural Department is making tests of all kinds in every section of the country, for which appropriations are being continually made, and it can not be said that these tests are being made for the Government of the United States; but it can be said, on the contrary, that they are being made for the people of the United States. The purpose of the tests is to develop a condition of facts upon which the people of the country can base action for the development of the various products of the country.

I want to call the attention of the Chair to the fact, in connection with this point of order, that a short time ago an appropriation was made for the construction of a Naval Academy at Annapolis and a limit of cost was fixed for the construction of the buildings there. The language of the appropriation is that the limit of the cost should be the amount of the appropriation; but later on it was developed that this appropriation was not sufficient to complete the buildings, and, notwithstanding the limit placed on the original cost of these buildings, this House passed additional appropriations. And the same thing is true with relation to the construction of the buildings of the Military Academy at West Point. And so we might go on and on.

This appropriation is recommended for the purpose of developing information which will be advantageous to the people of the country and in every section of the country. It develops the use of building materials, it fixes the location where these materials can be obtained, it develops great business enterprises because of the information furnished. It gives employment to labor everywhere. It demonstrates the character of materials that ought to be used in the construction of fireproof buildings. It has demonstrated the feasibility of the use of cement in the place of stone and other high-priced commodities, and because of the development of the utility of this material the cost of building has been reduced to the people of the country. And to say that this is not a public measure is but to beg the question. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the point of order made by the gentleman from Massachusetts ought to be overruled.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address the committee on the merits of the proposition, but since the point of order has been raised I wish to say that the authority for continuing this work is to be found in the organic act creating the Geological Survey. It reads as follows:

> Under the foregoing provision the National Academy of Science recommended that Congress establish, under the Department of the Interior, an independent organization, to be known as the United States Geological Survey, to be charged with the study of geological structure and economic resources of the public domain—

And so forth.

Under this organic law this work has been continued, and if, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] claims, the last appropriation act uses the language "to complete such test" I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that no doubt certain tests which were to be made as far as that appropriation reached were completed. But that does not say that this means the completion of this great work.

I will read from a document submitted to the Senate by the Secretary of the Interior to show how much of this work remains yet to be done. And incidentally let me try to dissolve the doubt in the mind of the Chair as to who is benefited by this investigation. It is true that a certain number of private parties have contributed material to the investigation. But the investigation was made on behalf of the Government for the benefit of the people, and if private parties contributed material for those tests and investigations it was done as a gratuitous act and cost the Government nothing, and for which we should be properly grateful. As to the necessity for continuing this work, I merely cite some of the reasons which are given here in this Senate document:

> The prevention of accidents in coal mines by the investigation of the use of explosives in the presence of coal dust and coal gasses in mines. The proportion of men killed in American coal mines is much greater than in any other country—three times greater than in Belgium, which has the most dangerous coal mines.

Mr. WEEKS. May I interrupt right there?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri to the fact that the point which he is now discussing is in the following paragraph; that it has nothing to do with the paragraph against which the point of order has been made.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. A number of reasons are given here for continuing the structural tests, just the same. I will not detain the House by reading from this report any further. But it is evident and plain to every gentleman, I presume, on this floor who has given any attention to this matter that this investigation has not been completed; that the appropriation provided in this bill is necessary to continue those investigations, and that the investigations are being carried on not in the interest of any private concern, but in the interest of the people of the whole country.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word. It seems to me that this appropriation is justified by the language of the original act creating the Geological Survey, because it comes within the definition of its powers in the examination of the mineral resources and products of the national domain. But aside from that altogether, this is evidently continuing a public work already in progress. It is of a tangible character, having machinery and all sorts of appliances connected with it, and it is of such a character that it has a perceptible end. It is not a work that goes on forever. It is a work that may be ended. Now, with respect to the question that the Chair put a moment ago——

Mr. LITTAUER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield.

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. LITTAUER. Was not the legislation in connection with this subject last year to put an end to it, and that on the 30th of June next?

Mr. DALZELL. I am coming to that in a moment.

Mr. McCALL. Why should a work of that kind go on forever inspecting and testing any building material that any gentleman may submit? Because, how could you ever bring to an end work of such a kind as to material which may be submitted to a test?

Mr. DALZELL. The testimony before the committee, if the gentleman had read it, was to the effect that this investigation would not last more than a certain number of years, and the number of years was named. Of course there is an end of investigation work of this kind, because materials to be investigated are necessarily limited; but with respect to the question the Chair put a moment ago, as to whether or not this was a test of materials of the United States or a test of materials in the United States, the fact as to that, I suppose, from reading the testimony, is that materials are supplied to this Survey by various parties to be tested, and of course the result of their investigation becomes a matter of common knowledge, and to that extent their investigation is in the interest of all the people; but the object of this investigation, primarily, is for the United States Government. The Supervising Architect, who appeared before the committee, testified that this investigation was rendered necessary in response to the Irrigation Commission, in response to the Engineer Corps of the Army and Navy, and in response to the demand made by the Isthmian Canal Commission, and he went on to testify. Mr. SULLIVAN asked him:

Mr. SULLIVAN. Do you think the continuance of Government aid would promote the science to such an extent as would make it profitable to the Government to continue the experiments, because of the advantages it would have in the construction of its own buildings?

Mr. J. K. TAYLOR. Yes; I think it would pay it in that advantage, but not in actual money. It would pay it in the advantages it would get in its own construction, which runs into a good many hundred millions of dollars in a year.

Mr. SULLIVAN further asked him:

I meant whether the results of the experiments would be so beneficial as actually to save to the Government in its building operations a sum of money equal to the cost of the experiment.

Mr. J. K. Taylor answered:

I think it would save not only that, but twice or three times as much.

Mr. TAYLOR. You mean it would be an investment paying 200 or 300 per cent?

Mr. J. K. TAYLOR. It certainly would.

Mr. TAYLOR. For the Government in constructing its own buildings now and those in contemplation?

Mr. J. K. TAYLOR. Yes; now in contemplation or already under way.

So that primarily this is an appropriation for a governmental purpose, although the result, of course, will inure to the benefit of all the people.

Now, with respect to the contention that the appropriation last year was for continuation and completion of this investigation. It was for a continuation and completion of an investigation. I do not know whether it related to this particular matter of structural materials or the investigation of coal. The investigation in contemplation when the appropriation was made that would be finished by the 1st of July, 1906, may, so far as I know, be completed then. This investigation is another investigation along the same line, and even if it were not so, the provision for completion was only a limitation on that current appropriation bill and did not make such a law as is contemplated by the rule. It would be absurd to say this Government would be foreclosed from continuing a great public work, because in the first instance it had misconceived the time necessary to be employed for the completion of that work and which had apparently not yet been completed, but was in actual progress.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield there? Is that limitation of time any different from the limitation that is put on in cost and which is frequently overridden by subsequent appropriations?

Mr. DALZELL. Not at all. It is a limitation that is valid for the current year, and that is all.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That is it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the appropriation for this work is first found in the general deficiency bill for 1905. The language is:

For the investigation of the structural materials of the United States—stones, clays, cements, etc.—under the supervision of the Director of the United States Geological Survey, $5,000.

The sundry civil bill of year before last for the same purpose contained identically the same language aside from the difference in the amount carried. Last year, when the appropriation came to be made, fearful that under the guise——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not at present.

Mr. MADDEN. I should like to ask him——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Just in a moment. Fearful that under the guise of making an appropriation for the St. Louis Exposition a new permanent branch of the public service was to be added, Congress changed the language to read:

For the completion of this work by July 1, 1906.

If a bill should pass this House authorizing the erection of a building at the cost of a million dollars, and that million dollars should be appropriated, and toward the close of the expenditure of that million dollars an additional appropriation should be put upon this bill of half a million for the completion or the continuation of that building, it would be no answer to a point of order to say that the building was in course of construction and was a work in progress. It would be a complete and sufficient answer under the ruling to say that if that building could not be completed for the amount appropriated, it was a violation of law and could not constitute a basis of authority in law for the putting of an item in the appropriation bill. Just exactly in the same way the Congress of the United States put a limit of cost upon this investigation of structural materials. It said that this money should be appropriated for the completion of the structural materials before the 1st day of July, 1906. That is an explicit and express limit of cost, just as explicit and just as express as the limit of cost upon a building or any other public work; and when gentlemen come and say the work is not complete, they base the application for a new appropriation, not upon authority of law, but upon an alleged violation of the law and a failure to complete the investigation within the time required by the act of Congress.

Mr. MADDEN. I just wanted to ask the gentleman if he was a member of the Appropriations Committee that reported this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I cheerfully answer the gentleman that I am a member of the Appropriations Committee that reported this bill, and that I have opposed this item at every stage of the proceedings.

Mr. MADDEN. I was going to ask him why he was opposing the adoption of the report of his committee.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I not only opposed it at the time, but I am opposed to it now, and in the committee I announced publicly that I purposed to resist the insertion of this item in the bill. There has been no concealment of my attitude from my colleagues on the Committee on Appropriations on this subject. Whether right or wrong—and I am not criticising those who differ from me—my conviction is that this thing ought to stop, and the law provides it shall stop, and I have always said that I opposed any continuance of the appropriation.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Since my friend from Iowa is discussing the merits——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No; I am only answering the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not upon the merits.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. But you have been discussing the merits.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not desire to hear a discussion of the merits.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have not discussed the merits, begging the pardon of the gentleman from Missouri; I have simply announced what was my reply to the query of the gentleman from Illinois. Now, if Congress provides by a specific law that the work of a bureau is to terminate on the 1st day of July, 1906, that a specific work is to terminate then, if that does not make it out of order to put an additional appropriation on the bill I do not know what language would be chosen for that purpose or what course could be pursued to that end. This law not only gave the right to carry on the work under the then existing appropriation, but it provided that this work should be completed by the 1st day of July, 1906; and when it says that, even though there had been authority in the act creating the Geological Survey to carry on that work, that was a solemn act of Congress declaring that this branch of the work of the Geological Survey should be concluded by the 1st day of July, 1906.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. If the organic act authorized this work to be continued, which, in my judgment, it undoubtedly does, does the gentleman not believe that this Congress has a right to make a provision to continue it?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Answering the gentleman, if he means that it would be in order on this bill, I say no. The Geological Survey was founded to conduct certain investigations, and whenever Congress passed a law that any portion of this investigation must be completed by the 1st day of July, 1906, that terminated the authority of the Geological Survey to make any further investigation upon this subject without a further act of Congress, even though such authority might have been contained in the original act.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand the gentleman's contention to be that because the clause in the sundry civil bill last year provided for the continuation and completion by the 1st day of July, 1906, of this work of investigation of structural material, that it is not now in order to provide for the continuation because after the 1st of July, 1906, we shall have completed it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not that we shall have completed it in fact.

Mr. KEIFER. We are dealing with the present, are we not, and the matter certainly has not been completed, and therefore it is in continuation, and we have a right under the rule to continue to appropriate for that object?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the gentleman making that argument if he sees fit. I want, if it is possible, to impress a single point on the Chair. I deny that the original act authorized these tests. I deny that the authority contained in this act ever authorized the test at all The Geological Survey was created in an appropriation bill. The language was:

For the salary of the Director of the Geological Survey, which office is hereby established under the Interior Department, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, $6,000: Provided, That this officer shall have the direction of the Geological Survey and the classification of the public lands and examination of the geological structure and mineral resources of the products of the national domain.

Mr. MADDEN. What does the gentleman call this, a mineral product?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If the gentleman would kindly wait I will try and tell him. Here is a law providing for geological survey of the mineral resources of the United States. I deny that under such a law there is any authority to found a laboratory outside of the national domain to carry on investigations in the laboratory as to the textile strength of materials as to the laws of physics with reference to materials everywhere outside of the national domain.

The CHAIRMAN. What does the gentleman understand by the term "national domain?"

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I understand "national domain" to be the public lands of the United States, and those lands which have been reserved from entry, as forest reserves, national parks, and the like, and those portions of the United States held in private ownership over which the national authority is supreme and exclusive.

Mr. MADDEN. That covers the whole United States.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. In regard to this matter the gentleman's point is not well taken, because these buildings that have been in use for the purpose of the exposition have been turned over to the Government of the United States at St. Louis for the purposes of this investigation. Consequently it may fairly be assumed that this is Government property to all intents and purposes.

Mr. LITTAUER. Has the land been ceded to the Government?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, no. Mr. Chairman, I can not see that these interruptions throw any light on the subject. I am clear that the national domain is distinct from State domain, inasmuch as the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the United States has the power to pass police regulations for the government of public lands even in the States, that the national domain necessarily includes the public lands, forest reserves, national parks, and all the Territories in the United States, including the District of Columbia.

But even if I should concede that the national domain had the wild meaning attached to it on yesterday, and that it included everything within the limits of the authority of the United States, still I deny that the geological survey of minerals of the United States has anything to do with the establishment of a laboratory to test the tensile strength of material and the sustaining power of stone. But if we confer express authority upon the Geological Survey to do these very things in the organic act, and then by a solemn act of Congress declare that it should complete that work by a given day, then that portion of its original authority terminates upon that day.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. But the day has not yet come.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And consequently there can be no appropriation for the year 1907, because before that year the necessary authority of the Geological Survey to investigate the structural materials will have absolutely ceased under an express act of Congress.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman contend that Congress has no power to reenact the law?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, certainly it has; but not on an appropriation bill.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. First, one has to obtain the consent of the Committee on Appropriations to do it.

Mr. MADDEN. Is not this appropriation immediately available, if it is passed?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it is not.

Mr. MADDEN. It says so.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It makes no difference whether it is immediately available or not. That probably makes it subject to a point of order in any event, because it is included in the sundry civil bill for the year 1907. It does not help its friends any. This project, this investigation, is not to continue at St. Louis.

Mr. MADDEN. Nobody claims that it is.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is contended here by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] that the Government of the United States has certain property in Missouri in the city of St. Louis, and that that has become a part of the national domain.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. No, no; that is not my contention.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is what I understood, and that is the only relevancy it had to my remarks.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I will state for the information of the committee and the Chair that certain buildings have been turned over to the Government of the United States by the city of St. Louis and by the World's Fair Exposition Company for the purpose of this investigation. No rent is being charged the Government. The Government uses those buildings free, and the right of occupancy is guaranteed to the Government of the United States if those tests should be continued.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman's enthusiasm on this subject seems to be moved in a measure by the fact that this is a local interest to him, but I want to assure him that if this appropriation is made it is with the distinct understanding that the whole plant is to be moved away from the city of St. Louis.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Has the gentleman any positive information on that subject? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have positive information in the hearings that there is no purpose of continuing the plant at St. Louis. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Iowa pardon me——

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, those statements ought not to be made without the record.

The CHAIRMAN. This discussion is, in the discretion of the Chair, on the point of order. The Chair knows nothing about that.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment on this point of the location of the laboratories to be conducted in connection with these tests.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a matter that enters into the decision of the Chair at all.

Mr. TAWNEY. It enters in this respect, that it answers the question of the Chair as to what material and for whose benefit this investigation is to be made.

The CHAIRMAN. If it throws light on that proposition, it is relevant.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will read a petition that was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, having been introduced into the House:

UNITED STATES TESTING LABORATORY.

Whereas an act is now pending in Congress providing for an appropriation of $350,000, the amount estimated and recommended by the Secretary of the Interior as necessary to carry on the investigations of the Geological Survey Bureau of fuels and structural materials at testing plants at present located at St. Louis; and

Whereas the board of directors of the chamber of commerce believes that such investigations should be continued and would be of inestimable value to the manufacturing interests of the country; and

Whereas the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Pittsburg is convinced that the ideal location for testing laboratories and investigations of this character is the city of Pittsburg, or its immediate vicinity, being the largest producer of fuel and structural materials in the world: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That this board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Pittsburg requests the Senators and Representatives from the Pittsburg district and those Senators and Representatives from adjoining cities and counties to favor the passage of the act carrying such appropriation as may be considered sufficient, provided that the location of these laboratories be left open until the claims of the Pittsburg district can be brought before the Director of the Geological Survey.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, what purpose has the gentleman in view in putting that in now?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is only for the purpose of calling the attention of the Chair to the fact, in answer to his own inquiry a few moments ago as to whose benefit this testing of structural material was made for, and that from this petition it appears that it was for the benefit of the local manufacturers and architects throughout the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I simply asked the gentleman from Minnesota why it was he put that into the RECORD at this particular time, and he said in answer to my claim that this was for the benefit of the Government. I expressly said, when I was on my feet before, that the result of these investigations would be for the benefit of everybody, the whole people, as well as the Government, although the Government is primarily interested in it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow just one question? I desire to say in respect to the statement made by my friend from Iowa that this plant would be removed from St. Louis, that if this point of order is not sustained and if the appropriation is made by Congress I am willing to take my chances in this matter as to St. Louis.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, if I may revert to the point of order, I will say, so far as that is concerned, that the city of St. Louis was left out of this item for the purpose of permitting the plant to be removed; and the gentleman probably is well aware of the fact that the city of St. Louis has appeared in the item heretofore. But that is neither here nor there. I rest this case on two distinct propositions. First, that an authorization for a geological survey is not an authorization to establish in any event laboratories in the United States for the purpose of testing the tensile strength of metals or the sustaining power of stone or cement or the like. Cement is not a natural product. It is a manufactured product. And there is no more power under the Geological Survey statute to provide for the testing plant for cement than for a testing plant for any other manufactured article. I deny that this is limited to the national domain. For these two reasons I insist that it was not within the original act. But if it was within the original act, suppose we pass a law this year appropriating $350,000, which should be the final appropriation for the completion of the work of the Geological Survey, would that not in and of itself terminate the authority of the Geological Survey?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Certainly not.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It would in effect repeal this authority for all future time, and nothing more could be done without a specific act of Congress; and so when Congress said, "We will enter upon the testing of structural materials," and later on said, "We will continue this for one year and no longer, and it shall be completed within that year and on the 1st day of July, 1906," there is no authority in law, even if it originally existed, to continue these experiments beyond the 1st day of next July; and as there is no authority to continue these experiments there is no authority to appropriate money to carry them on.

Mr. DALZELL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will permit me.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. Did not this take place before the committee on Tuesday, April 19, 1906:

Mr. SMITH. Are you interested in both the reenforced concrete tests and the fuel tests?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes; I am interested in both of them, but the major subject is that of structural materials.

Mr. SMITH. The committee will be glad to hear such a statement as you desire to make with reference to the continuance of the appropriation for experiments in structural materials, but I would suggest to you that the committee has no doubt about the value of those experiments, but that the only question in the minds of members of the committee, so far as I am advised, is whether the matter is not in such an advanced state now that it ought to be left to private effort to develop it, as in the case of other inventions.

Did that take place before the committee?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think substantially it did. I had no doubt then and I have no doubt now of the value of these experiments by people who want to pay for them, but I have some doubt about the duty of this Government to carry on these experiments for the cement manufacturers and steel manufacturers of the United States. I do not want to discuss the merits of this proposition. I have been trying to keep myself on the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to occupy the time of the committee but for a moment, and I want to confine that to a single point. I am now trying to be deliberate in what I say, in the possible hope that the regular chairman of the commitee will return. [Laughter.] I did not rise, Mr. Chairman, to prolong this discussion. I think we get very loose sometimes in our answers when questions are asked hastily. When the gentleman from Iowa was trying to impress upon the Chair the idea that a law last year had terminated the matter of the right to investigate structural material, he was asked a question as to whether or not the appropriation proposed now would be immediately available, and the distinguished chairman of the committee said it would not. Now, I read from the clause of the bill that the point of order is made against. The latter part of it says:

Under the supervision of the Director of the United States Geological Survey, to be immediately available, $50,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. It was understood that that provision was to be stricken out, but it was not stricken out, by mistake, in the reprint of the bill.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman says it was not to be put in, but it is in. The proposed appropriation for the purpose is to become immediately available.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is in.

Mr. KEIFER. Yes, it is in; so that the point of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] is entirely eliminated. We are proposing to-day, according to his argument, to continue that appropriation of money to be made immediately available, this work which he admits is not to terminate under the law of last year until the 1st day of July next. So the point of order can not be sustained on that ground. Because we propose in the future to do something, they say the rule does not apply at the present time that we may continue a public work or object.

Mr. McCALL. I wish to ask of the gentleman whether this appropriation can be used after the 1st day of July, 1906?

Mr. KEIFER. It can be used until it is used up.

Mr. McCALL. Then would it not be a change of existing law, if existing law required a certain work to be done before the 1st day of July, 1906?

Mr. KEIFER. Suppose it did. That would not affect the question. If the gentleman is familiar with Rule XXI of the House, he would see that we may make appropriations to continue public works or objects already in process of completion. So the point of order falls there. I understand the gentleman is very jealous of the Watertown Arsenal investigation up in Massachusetts. Some of my friends have been assailed because they were from St. Louis and from Pittsburg and supposed to be influenced by interest. I must say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] that we are not interfering with that little test plant up there at Watertown, which is equipped to test some small material that is provided to be tested for special uses and simply for the United States, and has nothing to do with this general provision.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, I would say that the gentleman is simply attempting to divert the attention from the question which I put to him.

Mr. KEIFER. I answered the question.

Mr. McCALL. If he wishes to respond by saying that it relates to the Watertown Arsenal, that is all right, but it is not responsive.

Mr. KEIFER. The distinguished gentlemen who appear here as undertaking to overthrow the great Appropriations Committee put the appropriate language in this clause, providing for the continuation of the investigation of structural materials. I admit, Mr. Chairman, I was drawn aside in my answers by the great precedents that were cited by the chairman of the committee and by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], and by the attack on my friend from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] and my friend from Pittsburg [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not attack anyone.

Mr. KEIFER. I thought you did.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] a question upon the provision contained in the last sundry civil bill for the continuation and completion. Is it not a custom or usage of the House and the Committee on Appropriations to employ the term "for completion" only where the limitation was fixed in the act authorizing the work?

Mr. KEIFER. Then they violate it in that case.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand that the use of the term "completion" is authorized only where the authorizing act fixes the limitation, and that simply "for completion" does not in and of itself fix the limitation. It is what is termed a precatory provision, one expressing a hope and desire that it shall be, but does not in and of itself fix a limitation that is used where a limitation is already fixed by law as general appropriations are fixed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not disturbed by that proposition, he will say to the gentleman.

Mr. WEEKS. When the gentleman from Ohio spoke the first time and was asked a question by the Chair, he was discussing the merits of this question, it seems, rather than the point of order; but he did not answer the question of the Chair. Now, I understand this plant, which has been referred to as being in St. Louis, is not engaged in doing Government work. When this appropriation was first made, it was a small one—$7,500—made for the purpose of doing testing for private individuals. The appropriation has been continued three or four years, and now the Geological Survey asks that it be increased about seven times—to $50,000. No work has been done at St. Louis for the Government. The testing has been entirely for the benefit of private parties. If a man has a clay bank or a stone quarry, he can take the clay or stone to this plant and the Government will do the testing for him, at no expense to himself.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. WEEKS. I will.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. If this investigation can prove that a certain material is better adapted for construction purposes than another, is cheaper, more valuable, easy to operate, and if the Government of the United States should make use of that knowledge and in the erection of its public buildings should make use of that new material, does not the gentleman think that we are serving a public purpose, particularly in view of the fact that we construct about $20,000,000 worth of public buildings every year, and some plan might be devised by which we could save some money, and if we save only 10 per cent of this $20,000,000, there would be a saving of $2,000,000 in the buildings we are to authorize in the very near future, if our hopes be realized?

Mr. WEEKS. I will admit that there may be some materials tested which will be a public benefit; but failing to make this appropriation does not destroy that public purpose. There are other testing plants owned by the Government, and it is contrary to good public policy for the Government to maintain the same kind of operations under two Departments of the Government. The Government does not test its own material at St. Louis. If an individual has any kind of building material which he wants tested, he can send it to a Government plant which is now in operation, which is not being worked to its full capacity, and can have that test made at cost. It is not right that the Government should be asked to furnish money as well as machinery to do this testing. If it puts its plant at the disposal of corporations and individuals, they should at least pay the cost.

Now, as to the merits of the point of order. The law requires that this testing shall be completed in 1906. I believe the Committee on Appropriations had no authority to insert in the present bill that it was a continuation of any provision of any appropriation, for it is not authorized by any existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that, in ruling on this proposition, the ruling is made regretfully. The Chair believes this to be a very meritorious measure, and one that ought to be enacted into law in order that it may be properly appropriated for. The Chair is constrained, however, to sustain the point of order on the legal question involved, for the following reasons: In the opinion of the Chair a good part of the difficulty has arisen because of a confusion of terms. The two terms "the United States" and the "national domain" have been greatly confused, in the opinion of the Chair, not only by the House but by the Department, and the Geological Survey itself in times past. If we read these lines carefully, we see here this language: "For the continuation of the investigation of structural materials of 'the United States.'" Now, what does that mean? Does that mean structural material belonging to the United States? In the opinion of the Chair it does mean that; and therefore can have reference only to the structural materials on the national domain, because they alone belong to the United States. But the construction that gentlemen who are the proponents of this proposition place upon it is, that it means all materials belonging to everybody in the United States, throughout the whole United States. Now the Chair desires to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Ohio has said, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has said, and that all the other gentlemen who have participated in the discussion have said, that this investigation does not have reference to the materials found upon the national domain alone, therefore owned by the United States, but that it does have reference to the material of private individuals anywhere in the United States. The Chair desires therefore to call attention to the organic act conferring power upon the Geological Survey and defining the authority of the Geological Surveyor. The Chair desires especially to call attention to these words, and wants the committee to hear:

> And that the Director and members of the Geological Survey shall have no personal or private interest in the lands or mineral wealth of the region under survey, and shall execute no survey or examination for private parties or corporations.

There is an express prohibition. And why was it put in there? Manifestly because under this original act the only materials of this kind that were to be investigated were the materials of the United States—that is, belonging to the United States. In other words, materials that were on the public domain or the national domain. Therefore when this organic act was passed, it said squarely that only those materials which belonged to the United States should be investigated; but not only that, but that no materials belonging to private individuals or to corporations should be investigated; an express prohibition, an express inhibition, and therefore, in the opinion of the Chair, the point of order would have to be sustained on that ground alone.

Mr. NORRIS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska want to say something?

Mr. NORRIS. I was waiting for the Chair to finish.

The CHAIRMAN. In the further opinion of the Chair, this point of order should be sustained because it is not a public work in progress, as the Chair believes. The Chair believes it is not one of those fixed and definite objects that can be completed, but would go on forever without completion.

> Stones, clays, cements, etc.

In that connection, the Chair might incidentally remark that cement is not a structural material of the United States, but is a compound, and the Chair thinks clearly that this would have reference only to those articles of building material, structural material, found in the earth. But be that as it may, the Chair is of the opinion that it is not one of those fixed and definite objects within the meaning of the law, within the meaning of our rules, that can be appropriated for.

Now, it is quite evident that Congress has not heretofore believed it to be one of those continuing objects, and it is quite evident that the gentlemen who propose this item do not believe it to be a continuing work in progress within the meaning of the law. Last year in the sundry civil appropriation bill this clause was embodied:

> For the continuation and completion on or before July 1, 1906.

Now, the Chair does not believe that that precludes another appropriation, but that it is simply descriptive of that act, and therefore the Chair calls attention to it only for this purpose, that Congress at that time probably thought it was a work which might be completed. But now gentlemen come up with the statement that it is not a work that can be completed for the $7,500 then asked for, but ask for a further appropriation of $50,000, showing conclusively, in the opinion of the Chair, that the gentlemen who framed this bill believed it was not a work which could be completed, but that it would go on indefinitely and with an increasing appropriation. Now, it was evidently the intention of the Congress that framed this law originally to have the structurals of the United States, or those mentioned in the succeeding paragraph, coal, and so forth, belonging to the United States, to be investigated, and not belonging to private individuals, because it says squarely in the organic act that no investigation or examination shall be made for private parties or corporations, evidently having in view that only those materials which belong to the United States should be investigated by the United States and at the expense of the United States. Therefore the Chair is clearly of the opinion that this is obnoxious to the rule; and, regardless of the merits of the proposition, the Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, may I make a parliamentary inquiry first?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. Am I right in concluding that the groundwork and foundation of the Chairman's ruling is that "national domain" and "public lands" are convertible terms under the act?

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, no; "national domain" and "public lands" are not convertible terms; but the Chair believes that the national domain has a well-defined meaning, and does not mean the whole United States. The gentleman from Pennsylvania yesterday argued that the "national domain" means the whole United States and all the States of the United States. The Chair has an entirely different opinion from that.

Mr. DALZELL. Because if that is so, then to hold the contrary means that the Geological Survey has no further functions and might as well be abolished.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not responsible for the law.

Mr. DALZELL. It is only a question of order, and a question of this moment ought not to rest on the decision of a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that no Department of the Government ought to be permitted to encroach on the Treasury of the United States simply because it is of the opinion that it ought to be done and is a meritorious work. Congress can pass a law authorizing these things expressly, and it is not for the Chair to pass on the merits of the controversy. The gentleman from Missouri has appealed from the decision of the Chair, and the question is——

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask if the Chair did not recognize the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to offer an amendment, and, if he did, if the appeal is now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would not seek to take an advantage of that character. The Chair wants to be fair about it, and the gentleman has the right to take the appeal. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the decision of the committee?

The question was taken; and it was decided that the decision of the Chair should stand as the decision of the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. A parliamentary question, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This bill seems to have been reported by the Committee on Appropriations. That is the label on the bill; but I should like to have the Chair tell me, with nine-tenths of the brains and four-fifths of the voting power against all these propositions, how they got here. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the gentleman think this bill ought to have a guardian ad litem?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; or else the committee had. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would refer the gentleman from Ohio to the Committee on Appropriations or to its various members. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Insert a new paragraph on page 77, after line 7, as follows:
"For the continuation of the investigation of structural materials belonging to the United States, such as stone, clays, cement, etc., under the supervision of the Director of the United States Geological Survey, to be immediately available, $100,000."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is the identical question that has just been ruled upon, and further that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the amendment as offered is a reenactment of the provision that went out on a point of order, but it obviates at least one of the reasons that the Chair has given for sustaining the point of order to that provision. As I understand it, one reason given by the Chair—and it seems to me a good reason, one that appeals to me as being substantial—is that the organic act provided that these tests must be made on property belonging to the United States.

The amendment is so framed that it confines it entirely and exclusively to the materials which do belong to the United States, and would not be subject to the criticism that the Chair found existed against the paragraph as it is in the bill, and it obviates the provision in the organic act which provides that no survey or test shall be made for private parties. In other words, it confines the appropriation entirely to the property of the United States. I do not care to discuss the other proposition contained, because it has been fully discussed and the Chair has passed upon it; but at least this amendment obviates the main objection given by the Chair for the decision just rendered.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. As everyone who has kept pace with this legislation understands, there are several very fine distinctions constantly being raised by these points of order on these paragraphs. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska is in order and not subject to a point of order. That paragraph reads as follows:

For the continuation of investigation of structural materials belonging to the United States—

Having reference to the materials on the national domain, which alone belongs to the United States, and therefore brings it within the act, in the opinion of the Chair. Further it says:

For the continuation of the investigation of structural materials belonging to the United States, such as stone, clays, cement, etc.

Heretofore the appropriation was for these materials of the United States. Now, the Chair does not know, as a matter of fact, but what there are in progress investigations and examinations of the structural materials on the public domain belonging to the United States, but taking into consideration what is meant now by the national domain, the public domain, the Chair is not inclined to hold that the structural materials to be investigated on the national domain are of such an extensive nature that it is not a work of progress to be completed within our rule.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the Chair be good enough to tell us what he holds the national domain to be?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so often ruled on that proposition that he does not think it necessary to restate it at this time.

Mr. LITTAUER. Did not the Chairman in his decision cover the point that the appropriation of the current year was for the completion of this work?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I just rose to ask that question.

Mr. LITTAUER. And that this is entirely new legislation and subject to a point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. No; the Chair thinks not, under the language of the new paragraph, for the continuation.

Mr. LITTAUER. Then I thoroughly misunderstood the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to be heard?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The Chair held distinctly that the law had operated and was at an end in its operation which authorized the investigation of this structural material.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not intend to hold that proposition at all.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The Chair will find by reference to the Reporter's notes, I think, that he did hold it, I respectfully submit.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. He thinks the gentleman is in error. The Chair said squarely that the mere fact that the words "for completion of" were incorporated in the last act did not preclude the committee from making this appropriation, and that the words "for the continuation," etc., were merely descriptive of that act. The Chair thinks those were the words employed.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The Chair, as I understood him, if the Chair will pardon me, in his former ruling held that cement was not such a subject as could be investigated under the organic law. That item is in this amendment.

Mr. OLMSTED. No, no; I think not.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And then I desire to make this further suggestion to the Chair, if the Chair will pardon me: I readily see that gentlemen, anxious to have their materials tested at Government expense, will cheerfully present to the Government of the United States cement and steel, and the mere fact that this amendment provides for the examination of property belonging to the United States does not carry with it the thought that the property is the product of the national domain of the United States.

Mr. KEIFER. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, I have asked politely the Chair's permission to offer these suggestions, and so long as the Chair does not object, I think the gentleman from Ohio might with great grace remain silent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] that the Chair would be much better satisfied with the amendment from a legal standpoint if it contained the express prohibition, as the Chair suggested in the other ruling, that none of this investigation was to be conducted for the benefit of private individuals, yet the language of the present amendment is not such, the Chair thinks, as to enable him to decide that it is the intention to conduct these examinations for the benefit of private individuals or private corporations.

Mr. LITTAUER. Right on that point there, if this is a continuation of examinations that have been going on, the experiments have been going on have been on the property of private individuals.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated squarely that, in his opinion, these investigations had not been exclusively for private individuals, but a portion of them may have been for the United States, and of materials belonging to the United States, on the public domain, and that therefore, so far as this amendment was concerned, it might relate to them—a continuation of the investigation of those particular items which had heretofore been investigated. Does the gentleman from New York catch the point?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, under the language of this amendment there can be no material tested except material taken from the public domain. I will ask the gentleman who introduced the amendment if that is not the fact? Is it not a fact that under your amendment there can be no investigation of any building material other than that taken from the public domain?

Mr. NORRIS. Well, belonging to the United States.

Mr. TAWNEY. Or belonging to the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true. I take it, however, that the Government may own a good many things that were not taken from the public domain. It might buy certain things, for instance.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes. Mr. Chairman, it may buy for its public buildings material that may be tested. That being the case, it is not necessary that this appropriation should be $50,000 more than was recommended by the committee in favor of the investigation of material of the United States and the investigation of material belonging to individuals and for the benefit of private corporations, such investigations as are now carried on. Now, why is it necessary to increase the amount which the Geological Survey has this year for this purpose, which is $7,500 to $100,000. The testimony before the committee showed conclusively that all of these tests, with the exception of the few that the Government would have made, of material to be used in the construction of public buildings, would be made of material belonging to individuals and corporations and for their benefit. So far as the material of the Government of the United States or that material which it uses in the construction of buildings is concerned, we have to-day at the Watertown Arsenal, Mass., and have had since 1888, a testing plant that has answered every purpose. Unlike the Geological Survey, the War Department can make tests for private individuals, and is to-day making tests for private individuals and for private corporations at a charge equal to the cost of making those tests. This the Geological Survey is expressly prohibited from doing, as stated by the chairman in his ruling a moment ago.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman know also that the Bureau of Standards, created by the Government for the express purpose of ascertaining the standards of various things, is also engaged in testing the standard or strength of materials of the different departments of the Government, and is equipped for that purpose?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say that I do know that, and I will state further that the Bureau of Standards is testing the material to-day that is going into the construction of the office building of the House of Representatives. Now, if this is to be a purely governmental testing plant for the purpose of testing and investigating the tensile strength of the structural material used by the Government of the United States in connection with its buildings, we have to-day two plants of that kind erected for that purpose, and which are being maintained and appropriated for annually and operated for that purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman know that the Agricultural Department is making tests in various kinds of lines, too?

Mr. TAWNEY. The Agricultural Department, I will say, is also engaged in making tests. The Bureau of Forestry in the Agricultural Department is making tests of building material such as I referred to. This idea of another testing plant originated in the Geological Survey, with the idea of grafting it upon the Geological Survey, thereby giving the Government three bureaus under which these tests can be made, and necessitating appropriations for the operation and maintenance of three plants for the doing of the same work. At the Watertown Arsenal, as I said before, tests are now made for individuals and corporations at their expense.

I am advised by the man in charge of the Watertown Arsenal that they have this year tested building material in sixteen of the States, and they have tested building material in forty-four of the States. They publish annually a book almost as thick as that, and almost that size [indicating], showing the official tests of structural material that are made by the testing machines in the Watertown Arsenal testing plant. I might say, also, that we have at the Watertown Arsenal the largest testing machine in the world. It is considered to be one of the most perfect testing machines. With it you can test the tensile strength of a shaft 6 inches in diameter and 10 feet in length, and this machine will also test the tensile strength of a horsehair, and accurately register the strength of each. That machine was purchased in 1888, at a cost of $250,000. They have also a laboratory in connection with that testing plant. They are thoroughly equipped for the testing of all building material, and for the last six years have been conducting tests of reenforced cement; and if any gentleman has read the testimony before the Committee on Appropriations on this subject he will see that the primary object for which this appropriation was desired by the Geological Survey was for the purpose of solving problems, as they said, with respect to the strength of reenforced cement. And the Watertown Arsenal is to-day conducting that same experiment, solving those same problems, and testing this same structural material. Mr. Chairman, what is the necessity of adding to another bureau of the Government, with all of the necessary machinery, including this board of scientific engineers of thirty-nine men, that I referred to yesterday? This board Mr. Holmes, of the Geological Survey, testified was created for the purpose of acting and consulting with the Geological Survey in the making of these tests, to be paid at the rate of $5 a day for actual services.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], who has just taken his seat, how much we have appropriated for, say, several years back, for this purpose, and how much is carried in this bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. Fifteen thousand dollars is carried in this bill for the Watertown Arsenal testing plant, and the officer in charge of that testing plant says that it has a capacity for doing four times the amount of work they are doing now and that there are demands for the doing of that much work and that it could do it if the appropriation was large enough to enable them to do it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much was carried in the last bill previous to this?

Mr. TAWNEY. Fifteen thousand dollars.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much in the year previous to that?

Mr. TAWNEY. Fifteen thousand dollars for a number of years back.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much is it proposed now to increase that?

Mr. TAWNEY. Not at all.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I think the gentleman is mistaken in regard to that. It is proposed to increase that a hundred thousand dollars, is it not?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; they do not propose to increase this appropriation for the Watertown Arsenal at all, but they propose to appropriate $100,000 for the creation of a new testing plant, to be operated in conjunction with the Geological Survey, a wholly unnecessary expenditure. The only ground upon which you can justify the establishment of a testing plant by the Government is to test material consumed by the Government in the construction of public buildings and other public works. For this purpose we now have two testing plants—the Bureau of Standards and the testing plant at the Watertown Arsenal, in Massachusetts. The establishment of another in connection with the Geological Survey is absurd, unnecessary, and an extravagant expenditure of public money. The two testing plants we now have are fulfilling the only necessity the Government has for any plant of this kind. This amendment should, therefore, be defeated.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. To do the same kind of work that the Geological Survey is now doing? Let me understand the gentleman, please. I think I can catch what he says. The gentleman states propositions very clearly. We have appropriated $15,000 per year heretofore for carrying on this examination, and now you propose to appropriate more money for the same purpose, to create other establishments, to enlarge the work.

Mr. LITTAUER. One hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. TAWNEY. One hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Make a clear increase of $100,000 for this purpose?

Mr. TAWNEY. For the next fiscal year, to be increased hereafter as the Bureau and the testing plant grows; and under this provision, in order that a corporation or private parties that want their material tested may get that test made by the Government for nothing, the owner of the material would make a present of the material to the Government, and then the Government could test it, because it would then be the property of the Government, and by this subterfuge they would defeat the organic law creating the Geological Survey as well as this amendment, which prohibits them from making any tests of material except from the public domain or for individuals or corporations.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Are they making tests for individuals?

Mr. TAWNEY They are.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is not that in disobedience of the law?

Mr. TAWNEY. Under the organic law they are expressly prohibited from making tests for private individuals or corporations.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And if they are making them they are making them in disobedience to that law?

Mr. TAWNEY. They are testing material for coal companies, coking companies, and for structural material companies, for engineers and for architects. Now, the gentleman can draw his own conclusion.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. As I have always understood, the Government has had its own testing plant and experts in these matters. That is my information.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will read to the gentleman from the testimony taken before the committee. It appears on page 576:

The CHAIRMAN. Are the tests which they make sufficient to meet the requirements of the public in the localities in which these local buildings are being constructed?

Mr. HOLMES. The architects and engineers, Mr. Chairman, say they are not; and I may say, in part response to your remark, and to make clear what I want to say in explanation, that there has been appointed by the several engineer societies of the country during the past three years a standing committee to bring together the results of all tests which might be found satisfactory in giving correct information, which the architects and the builders in the country really need.

That committee has gone very carefully over the tests which have been made in one way or another in this country during the past twenty years; and they have come to the conclusion, as expressed by themselves, that hardly any of these tests have any value as giving specific information to the architect or the engineer which is of service to him to-day.

Then the chairman asked him:

Is it not a fact, Mr. Holmes, that the means of making these tests are well known to engineers, architects, and scientific men—that is, how to make the tests is known to all of you?

Mr. HOLMES. There is a good deal of difference of opinion, Mr. Chairman, about that.

I had the testimony marked in one place where they are making tests of coal for the benefit of the coking companies of Pennsylvania. The process is this: When there is a large building contemplated, the individual owner or corporation, when it is proposed to build that structure, calls upon these consulting engineers, one of whom appeared before the committee, for their opinion as to the best material to be used in the construction of that building. Before that material is accepted it must stand a certain test.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Whose building is this you are talking about?

Mr. TAWNEY. A building that may be owned by a private individual or corporation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who is paying this officer—the Government?

Mr. TAWNEY. The Government pays the man making the tests; the consulting engineers are paid by the owner of the building; but their opinion is based upon the results of the Government tests.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask for two minutes more; I want to get a little more light on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to help my fellow-men and countrymen wherever I can legally. I am glad to aid wherever we can aid. If Congress has the power to do this, the question is, Is it wise policy to do it? Now, I submit in all candor that the Government of the United States is going beyond the duties of the Government of the United States to the people of the United States when it takes the money out of the Treasury—tax money—and the Treasury is low enough in funds, and you know that we will need all that we have there, and take this money and go and examine the coal for a coal-mining company, and the clays for another company, and the steel material, and any other thing that a private concern or private individual is connected with and test that. I say the time has come when we ought to put a stop to it. Gentlemen, in all candor are we not going to such a point that the first thing we know we will employ some one to go down and try to teach somebody how to set a hen, and the kind of eggs to use, and directly will have somebody instructing us whether we should mark them in red ink or with charcoal and examine to see whether the chickens will be cross-eyed or not, and all sorts of things that ought not to be done by the Federal Government? I have no objection to the test of material being made where the Government wants to use it or to experiment for the public. I am not surprised that gentlemen, from that standpoint, are endeavoring to preserve the Treasury from profligacy when we have the great strain on it, such as the Panama Canal, rivers and harbors, and other things. An effort is now made to increase this appropriation, and I am satisfied is offered in perfectly good faith, but to help out some community or some individual. That, it seems to me, is unwise—the kindness and generosity of the Government run mad.

Mr. NORRIS. As far as the amount named in the amendment is concerned, it is possible that it ought to be changed. I confess that upon that particular point I have no objection, as far as the amount is concerned, to its being cut down to the amount originally named by the committee in the bill as reported here. But, in the first place, I want to disabuse the mind of my friend from Tennessee and the minds of all others who may think as he does that this appropriation is for the purpose of any particular set of men or for any particular locality. No appropriation that has been made in this Congress will more greatly redound to the benefit of the people of the entire country than will this appropriation, if this amendment is carried. It is a peculiar thing that the Committee on Appropriations of this House have become so wonderfully virtuous since reporting this bill. They themselves put into the bill an item of $50,000 for this purpose, which they have been instrumental in getting out on a point of order, and they are still trying to keep out an amendment that practically puts the paragraph back into the bill. If it is wrong now, it was wrong when the committee framed the bill and put this item in it. In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, the benefit that is to come to the country will be mainly from the tests made by the Government upon the building materials that it owns and that are found upon its lands. I want to pause right here to answer something that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations referred to. He referred to a whole lot of different departments that he desired us to believe were making tests along the same line. It is true they are making tests. The Agricultural Department is making tests in forestry, and we want them to keep on making tests. He gave the impression, when the gentleman from Tennessee asked about experiment stations, that the investigation and experiments contemplated by my amendment were amply provided for by the appropriation for tests at Watertown, when, as a matter of fact, the $15,000 item for tests at Watertown is something absolutely independent of this particular provision, and on a different page in the bill, having nothing to do with this any more than the flowers that bloom in the springtime.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What does your amendment propose to do?

Mr. NORRIS. My amendment practically puts back lines 9, 10, 11, and 12, of page 77, of the bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What are the words?

Mr. NORRIS (reading):

For the continuation of the investigation of structural materials belonging to the United States, such as stone, clays, cement, etc., under the supervision of the Director of the United States Geological Survey, to be immediately available, $100,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman indulge me a minute?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is that to investigate public property belonging to the United States Government?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And for the United States Government?

Mr. NORRIS. Owned by the United States Government.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And for the Government of the United States?

Mr. NORRIS. For the Government of the United States, and incidentally for everybody in the United States.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] says we have plenty of money to do that. Now, why do you ask for more?

Mr. NORRIS. As I said, I have no objection to putting it back to $50,000, but the gentleman from Minnesota does not want anything. He wants to take it all out.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I did not so understand the gentleman.

Mr. NORRIS. I put in a hundred thousand dollars, because the committee, it seemed to me, were unjustly cutting down a whole lot of items for the work of the Geological Survey, and I made it large enough. I have no objection to its being put back to $50,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. NORRIS. Not in my time. I do not care to do that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Go ahead.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, one of the principal things coming out of this investigation, and that has already come, is the advancement of knowledge with reference to building materials—cement, perhaps, more than any other. Lumber is high and has been getting higher all the time. Men are seeking all over the country for some other material to take its place in building, and recent investigations by private parties, and also by the Government, have developed the fact that there are wonderful possibilities in different materials, such as cements and kindred things, and the result is that on account of the investigation and the publicity given to the subject we will have something to take the place of the more expensive materials in building and other branches of industry. I had my attention called to a new material just the other day. The Department is experimenting with it and it promises to equal cement and is much cheaper. This Department is making it easier and cheaper for our people to build houses, and——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for about three minutes more.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to object to further extensions of time, because we want to get through with the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. All right.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I would not take the floor again to support my Committee on Appropriations but for some criticisms that have been made in the iregular discussions that have been going on in the last few days against certain public officers—the Director of the Survey, and also a very distinguished professor, who the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations thinks ought to have been asleep on duty instead of being actively interested in the business that they are officially chosen to carry on. All the criticisms on the Director of the Survey have been mere criticisms on his enthusiasm to do and vigorously prosecute the work that he has been selected to do; and there has been no criticism that he neglected his duty in any respect. The same may be said of the criticisms of the chairman of the committee of Professor Holmes, who, I believe, is engaged mainly in the investigation of structural materials and fuel. He wanted the country to understand the great importance of the work he was engaged in, and he has made the country, I hope, understand it, as well as Members of Congress. He had a perfect right to answer letters from the gentleman's district from distinguished educators there. I protest against gentlemen coming on the floor of the House and assailing a man, or an official, who can not open his voice in his defense.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does the gentleman from Ohio justify the action of Professor Holmes in emasculating a letter of mine?

Mr. KEIFER. That is an issue I do not propose to take up between the gentlemen.

Mr. DALZELL. I propose later on to say something on that subject. Professor Holmes denies that he did any such thing, and I have a letter from him on that subject, and I have also had a conversation with him.

Mr. TAWNEY. I haven't any doubt that the gentleman has a letter from him.

Mr. DALZELL. I advise the gentleman to go carefully on that question. I shall have something to say about it later on.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I do not enter into that controversy. It is not necessary for me to do that.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the Holmes matter has nothing to do with this amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. That is all right; Professor Holmes was assaulted yesterday when he had no opportunity to answer, and I think I may properly offer a word in his defense. Now, there was a great deal said by the chairman about having a plant in Watertown, Mass., that was doing this very same work. I say to the committee that the plant at Watertown has no duty at all connected with the work of investigating structural materials or fuel, and it is so provided in this very bill, in which we make an appropriation of only $15,000 to continue the plant. It is stated in this bill precisely what may be done at Watertown, and it will be seen that there is nothing required to be there done that we are now trying to provide for. Let me read the clause of the bill that relates to it.

> Testing machines, Watertown Arsenal: For the necessary professional and skilled labor, purchase of materials, tools, and appliances for operating the testing machines, for investigative test and tests of United States material for constructions, and for instruments and materials for operating the chemical laboratory in connection therewith, and for maintenance of the establishment, $15,000.

Now, the test thus provided is limited to "United States material for construction," and has nothing to do with the general testing of structural materials belonging to the United States which is for the general benefit of the whole country. But gentlemen say that this testing of material is an expensive thing. In my opinion, if we pass a public-building bill in a day or two, as we are likely to, where we are going to appropriate $10,000,000, or more, if we put in this appropriation, and the tests are faithfully made, as they certainly will be, we will save ten times over the amount of the appropriation now proposed in the construction of the public buildings we will authorize to be erected all over the country.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendment close in five minutes.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, a petition was presented here a little while ago from the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburg, in which they ask for the removal of this testing plant from the city of St. Louis to Pittsburg. That desire on their part is laudable. I have no doubt there are a large number of other cities that would like to have this plant. But the plant is now at the city of St. Louis, the buildings have been turned over to the Government, the machinery has been provided, and I hope if this item is approved by the committee such action will be construed to mean that the intention of the lawmakers is that the plant is to remain where it is now, namely, in the city of St. Louis.

But, aside from that, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this investigation is not being carried on for the purpose of developing any private property, as might be inferred from what has been said here. The investigation is carried on only to settle certain fundamental questions as to the relative merits of stone, brick, concrete, and other structural materials, and the use in the investigations of any special granite or limestone is incidental to the general purposes of the investigation. The question is as to what type of material and in what form these materials can be used to the best advantage and most economically by the Government. Through my connection with the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I have become convinced, not only of the absolute necessity of continuing these investigations, but also of their great benefit to the people and to the country, and particularly to the Government itself. As has been stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], if, under this present building bill which we are soon going to pass here, the better material should be used which has already been discovered for use in constructing buildings, we will save nearly $2,000,000—ten or twenty times the amount which this investigation costs—and since the total expenditure of the Government for public buildings and public works of all kinds is about two hundred millions in ten years, the members of the committee can themselves figure out how much saving this investigation will effect to the pockets of the taxpayers of the country. I hope that not only this item of $50,000 will be voted, but that the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], asking for an increase to $100,000, may be voted by this committee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to an inquiry?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds tell us how much the Government of the United States expends annually in structural material in public buildings?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. How much the total is?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; for the material.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I have a list here which shows that the total expenditures of the Government of the United States for public buildings of all kinds under the War and Navy, Treasury, and all other Departments of the Government was two hundred and two millions during the last decade. It is to be presumed that that amount will be largely increased during the next decade.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell the committee how the increase in this appropriation is going to lessen the cost of that material? What has the examination about structural material to do with the cost of the material?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman's question, I will say that as a result of these investigations the cost of construction has already been lessened to the Government by the use of certain materials heretofore unknown, and I want to call the further attention of the committee to the fact that all other countries—all other civilized countries—carry on investigations of this kind, and it is time for the United States to follow suit and do the same, in order that better and cheaper building material may be used in the future.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska, which, without objection, the Clerk will again report.

There was no objection; and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. NORRIS) there were—ayes 36, noes 32.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. TAWNEY, and the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. NORRIS, as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 36.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I now move to strike out $100,000 and insert in lieu thereof $50,000, which the gentleman from Nebraska says he has no objection to.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not in order.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The amendment has been adopted and before the paragraph is passed I move to amend it.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, but it is passed.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that the amendment having been adopted by the committee it is not now subject to amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the continuation of the analyzing and testing of the coals, lignites, and other fuel substances of the United States, in order to determine their fuel values, and so forth, under the supervision of the Director of the United States Geological Survey, to be immediately available, $100,000.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against this paragraph. I contend that this paragraph is obnoxious primarily because it does not provide for matters which come properly within the scope of the Geological Survey, which by statutory provision is confined entirely to the examination of geological structures and mineral resources of the public domain, while this paragraph permits, and in fact has in the past, been applied almost entirely to analyzing and testing coals and lignites furnished by private individuals. Secondly, I contend that it is obnoxious to the rule of the House in that it is a change of existing law. The existing law covered by the item in the current appropriation bill is for the continuation and "completion at St. Louis, Mo., on or before July 1, 1906."

It is a change of existing law, in that these words are omitted from this paragraph in the bill under consideration. The current law makes it mandatory that the work be carried on at St. Louis, while the paragraph under consideration omits that mandatory requirement, and consequently permits the work to be carried on elsewhere or anywhere, thereby changing existing law. It is not in continuation of a public work which has been specifically provided for. It is not a public work in continuation in the ordinary acceptation of this term, but was specifically appropriated for continuation and completion at St. Louis, Mo., before July 1, 1906, as I have heretofore stated.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the point of order, I beg to submit with reference to this paragraph the same objection does not obtain which obtained as to the foregoing paragraph; that this refers plainly to the fuels, coals, and lignites that are the property of the United States.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, can I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. LITTAUER. Under the operation of the law which is now current, does the gentleman mean to say that the coals and lignites examined are only such as are the property of the United States?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I say that, speaking to the amendment and the record as it stands, the plain and obvious construction of the language is that it is the coals, lignites, and fuels of the United States—that is, belonging to the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Colorado inform the Chair whether there is any difference, so far as the language of the statutes is concerned, between this paragraph and the preceding paragraph as printed in the bill?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I think not. But, if the Chair please, it seems to me that if this were a piece of absolutely new legislation, if the paragraph had never appeared in any appropriation bill, it still would be obviously in order under the general organic act establishing the Geological Survey, which is meant purely for the development, for the examination, for the inspection and the classification of the mineral resources. I do not care to argue the point. I wanted simply to submit the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair is unable to differentiate between this paragraph and the preceding paragraph which was ruled out on the point of order. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 77, line 12, after the word "dollars," insert the following as a new paragraph:

"For the continuation of the analyzing and testing of the coals, lignites, and other minerals and fuel substances belonging to the United States, in order to determine their fuel value, and so forth, under the supervision of the Director of the United States Geological Survey, to be immediately available, $100,000."

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order. I do not desire to argue it except to call attention to the fact that these tests are not covered by the resolution of 1882, which was relied upon as sustaining a similar one with reference to the testing of structural material.

The CHAIRMAN. The resolution of 1882 was not relied upon. The question was ruled out as not being continuing law. It has not anything to do with it.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. As I understand the ruling of the Chair on a previous paragraph, the point was that the organic act of the survey limited operation to the property of the United States, and the amendment offered is clearly in line.

The CHAIRMAN. The organic act, which has already been referred to and quoted, provides for the examination of the geological structure and mineral resources and products of the national domain. It seems to the present occupant of the chair that that language is broad enough to cover fuel substances belonging to the United States. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out "$100,000" and inserting "$250,000."

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] offers an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BROOKS], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "one hundred" and insert "two hundred and fifty;" so as to read "$250,000."

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I did not understand that to be the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I understood the gentleman to offer to make this $150,000.

Mr. DALZELL. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. I do not propose to occupy any time further than to say that last year's appropriation was $202,000, and the estimate, as furnished by the Geological Survey to the Appropriations Committee, called for $250,000. And the testimony given before the committee satisfies my mind that a very good reason was shown here, if we are to continue these tests and continue the force we have, and do efficient and economic work, it is necessary to have this amount of money.

Mr. LITTAUER. Will the gentleman point out where in the testimony is the part to which he refers?

Mr. DALZELL. I can not take this volume and pick out here and there.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The record shows, Mr. Chairman, that the total appropriation for this purpose at the St. Louis Exposition, to which the establishment of this testing plant was an adjunct, was $95,000. Last year, by assurance to the committee that this testing would be completed within twelve months, an increase was obtained from $95,000 to $202,000. At the end of the year, in place of reporting that they have completed these tests, as they had assured the committee they would, they demand $250,000 for the next fiscal year, or an amount far in excess of what they have asked for in the past. I want to say that whatever differences of opinion may have existed in the subcommittee in preparing this bill, as to the wisdom of continuing these tests that subcommittee was unanimous in the opinion that if this was to be a permanent affair, $100,000 was an abundance and all that under the circumstances ought to be given. This proposition is to-day making this practically a permanent branch of the public service, with a larger appropriation by nearly 25 per cent than was asked for it when that service was to be completed within twelve months. I certainly hope this House will not establish a precedent of giving $250,000 every year for the testing of fuels alone.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Minnesota himself has given the reason and the purpose for which the increased appropriation was asked, and that very little need be said. It is true that when this work began it began, as many other governmental operations begin, in a rather small way; but it very soon appeared from these experiments and particularly the experiments in briquetting and in rendering available the lower grades of fuel substances that they were of very great value to all the people of the United States, and they were of exceptionally great value to the Government of the United States itself as owning the large public domain in which these fuel reserves are located. So, very properly, and very aptly, last year the Geological Survey asked for a larger appropriation of $202,000; and they come back this year and make an explanation of the needs of the work and ask for $250,000. Now, this sum is a bagatelle. It is too small to be put into comparison with the immense importance of the work in the development of our fuel resources.

Mr. Chairman, in a single locality, and in a very small locality comparatively, the added value to the fuel resources of the United States resulting from making available previously unavailable lignites is many times the amount carried in this appropriation. There are thousands of miles, and I speak advisedly, under which there are low grades of lignites of hardly any value at the present time, but which, if the investigations——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him what particular location is it where there is such an immense amount of value that has been developed as the result of these investigations and tests? Where is it located, and what is the amount?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I did not say that at all. I said in very many sections throughout the country there are large quantities of very poor lignites which these experiments are showing to be available for fuel.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. He said that there were locations where these experiments had already developed thousands and thousands of dollars of value. I would like to know what in and where.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I do not think the gentleman followed my feeble remarks.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I thought they were not feeble, but vigorous.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. What I meant to say was that these experiments are proving very valuable in demonstrating the adaptability of very low-grade coals to fuel purposes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Can you point me any specific instance of that? What is the specific instance where the test was had? What are they; what have they developed; how much value, and in what place?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I have not the figures; but it has been very great.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Give the place.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. If the gentleman will kindly allow me to explain, I will state to the gentleman that these low grades of coal, and sometimes even coal dust, can be briquetted at very small cost, so that they can be used and have a value for steam engines, coal for locomotives and furnaces, and very many other purposes where higher grades of coal heretofore have been used; and if the gentleman from Maine cares to go to the Geological Survey he can see the briquets and also the dust and the disintegrated coal from which the briquets are made.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will the gentleman please state the place?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I can not yield further; I have only a few moments.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, the gentleman has not yet stated the place where there has been this development.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. These low-grade coals exist in very large areas in several States of the West. They exist in Texas, in Kansas——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I do not want to use so much; I would just like to finish this sentence. These areas exist in Kansas, in Iowa, in Texas, and in Colorado, in addition to very large areas of higher grade and more valuable coals; and the same processes apply to coal dust from the harder coals of Pennsylvania and the Allegheny Mountains.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Was the time of the gentleman from Colorado extended five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. It was not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I was hoping that it was. I wanted to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask to have it extended?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Colorado be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from Colorado mentions Kansas as one of the places that has been benefited by these investigations. May I suggest to the gentleman that the Department for which this appropriation is now being made failed to discover a coke-bearing coal in Kansas, failed to find that the Kansas coal would make coke at all, and published to the world that the bituminous coals of that State would not make coke, in face of the fact that there is a large coking establishment in the State making coke there within that coal field, and in the face of the fact that the Department was offered coal from that district out of which to make tests at St. Louis?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does the gentleman mean that they would not make them?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I mean that they refused a carload of Coke from Cokedale.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I did not yield for a speech. I do not know but there may have been a specific instance where these experiments were unsuccessful, but I do know that over very large areas they have been successful, and I am glad that the gentleman called my attention to the matter of coke, because there are many coals which were supposed to be noncoking which these experiments have proved to be coking coals, and if any gentleman is curious, Mr. Walcott will show him examples of the supposed noncoking coals which he has successfully treated and shown to be coking.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But in this instance——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In this instance we were making coke in large quantities, and the Geological Survey said our coal was not a coking coal.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I do not know anything about that specific instance, but for the purposes of the record I will admit all that the gentleman says.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield to the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not ask the question for the purpose of embarrassing the gentleman from Colorado, as I hope he understands.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I want to get information of a detailed character in regard to the question. I am entirely uninformed about it. Is there any particular place where the Geological Survey have made practical tests and investigations and produced tangible, valuable results; and if so, where, so that we can get some notion of it?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I shall be very glad to answer that question to the best of my ability.

Mr. DALZELL. May I call attention to just one item?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I shall be glad to get information from anywhere.

Mr. DALZELL. I call the gentleman's attention to the testimony of Mr. Holmes, who says:

> The result of our investigation shows that less than nine-tenths of a pound of coal was required to develop 1 horsepower for an hour, whereas for the new battle ship New Jersey, recently tried and about to be accepted, the best that could be done with marine steam boilers was the production of 1 horsepower with 2.2 pounds of coal.

Now, there is a result that may be estimated in dollars and cents.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is one specific instance. Now, are there any others? I want to get information of what they are doing.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. In Colorado there are great deposits of lignite coal of varying quality, some very good, some not so good, and some poor. Mr. Wolcott told me he had experimented with the coals from some of those poorer mines, where when the veins come to the top of the ground they are very shaley, and sometimes almost disintegrated, and found that he could make an excellent coal briquet from them, and he showed me the briquets which he said came from there. Of course that appealed to me at the time. I did not expect to speak upon this question when I came a little while ago, but I remember that specific instance. And in the same conversation and more than once he has mentioned to me half a dozen other places in the United States where similarly important results have been reached.

[The time of Mr. BROOKS of Colorado having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended one minute.]

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. He cited numerous instances where the bituminous coal dust of Pennsylvania and of the Allegheny Mountains could be rendered available in the same way. He mentioned, also, the coals of Missouri. These experiments have only just started, and therefore it is natural that complete results in many instances have not yet been attained.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. May I inquire this?

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Maine——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, had the item remained in the bill in its original form, I should have supported the committee as against any demand for an increase, believing that this work could be continued advantageously with an annual appropriation of $100,000. But, Mr. Chairman, the item has been amended and now relates only to coals belonging to the Government, coals on the public land, and as this seems to be the only way to secure any appropriation I shall support the amendment. I think it is not generally understood—and I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Maine—how very extensive are the deposits of bituminous, anthracite, and semianthracite and lignite coals on the public lands. In my own State there are about 30,000 square miles, nearly one-third of our entire territory, underlaid with lignite and semi-bituminous coal.

In New Mexico there are several million acres underlaid with the best qualities of bituminous, anthracite, and semianthracite coal. In the Dakotas, in Montana, in Washington, in Oregon and elsewhere on the public lands there are very large areas of coal. In other words, the Government has to-day many millions of acres of coal lands.

Mr. DALZELL. Forty-five million acres.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says 45,000,000 acres, and I think that is a conservative estimate. There may not be that many acres underlaid with valuable coal, but certainly on the entire public domain there is that amount of land underlaid with coal of some character.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Do I understand that the appropriation is confined to the development of coal owned by the Government?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; as I understand the amendment, the appropriation will be confined to coal in which the Government is interested, and largely the coals upon the public land.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. So the appropriation is not to be used for the purpose of developing private property?

Mr. MONDELL. It would have been used for the purpose of developing generally the coal and coal values of the country except for the point of order made against the original item of appropriation.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. But under existing conditions it is simply Government property that it applies to?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; I think so. Now, Mr. Chairman, this land is for sale by the Government at $20 an acre. The Government owns hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of coal lands. These lands, some of them, contain coal which is not of a high grade in its natural state, and some of the investigations of great value which have been made have been along the line of briquetting lignites and testing the use of lignites in locomotives and elsewhere under forced draft. A few years ago it was not thought that the lighter lignite coals could be used for locomotive purposes. The large per cent of water and volatile gases in these coals seemed to render them useless for locomotives, owing to the forced draft. Some years ago experiments were made with a view of utilizing lignites for locomotive purposes. One of the results is that in my own State mines, which a few years ago could only market their coal for stationary engines and domestic purposes, are now finding a good market on the railroads. The coals are being used successfully for locomotives, with the result that the Government has sold hundreds of acres of coal lands which otherwise it would not have sold. Such investigations and experiments as this have been and can be carried on under this appropriation. It has made possible the development of industries that could not otherwise have been developed. The question of briquetting coal, lignites, the waste of anthracite and bituminous coals, is a most important one. Up to the time that these investigations were undertaken we knew little in this country of the possibility of utilizing these fuels which generally go to waste. Valuable work has been done along these lines. It has been proven that many lignites can be successfully briquetted, and at a reasonable cost, a cost so low as to make them commercially valuable. They have proven that lignites, heretofore held of trifling value, can be made valuable by being utilized in gas-producing engines. It has been demonstrated that the waste of bituminous coal can be briquetted, and they desire to further investigate to learn whether the briquettes of lignite coals, made without a binder, can be waterproofed. This investigation has been exceedingly valuable in the examination of the coals of practically every section of the country.

I am surprised to hear the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] say that the gentleman in charge of this work refused to take coal from Kansas, because my experience is that they have sent notices out all over the country, have asked people to send coal, have sent men to the mines to superintend the loading of coal on the cars in order that they might examine a fair sample of the mine.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, it is only fair that I state that we have a coal district that runs diagonally across the southeast corner of the State. One of the coal companies that was a subsidiary company of a railway that ran into St. Louis turned a carload of coal over to this department for tests as to its coke-bearing qualities. Everyone in the coal district knew that the coal from that section of the field was not a coke-bearing coal. The coke-bearing coal is in the southeast portion of the field, and they were offered a carload of coal from there, which they never used. They did make an official report, in which they declared that the field did not contain coke-bearing coal, whereas there is a large coke establishment in the field.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that the coal that was tested from that field would not coke. They made such a report with regard to a particular field in my State, and I want to say to the gentleman that that report was valuable because it saved intending investors a considerable amount of money and led them to look for a market for that coal in another direction.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It was unfair to that whole field to publish that it did not contain a coal that would make coke.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, in response to the question of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] as to the manner and where values have been shown to exist where values were not suspected or known before, I desire to submit the case of the augmented value and importance of the Texas lignite beds. As I said yesterday in the House when it was in a state of great confusion and when probably he and no one else heard what I said, we have no important coal deposits in the State of Texas. We have no high-grade coal so far discovered in that State. We do have vast deposits of lignites, or unmatured coal. Experiments made at St. Louis by the Geological Survey have shown that by the conversion of that lignite into gas, which is not an expensive process, and by the use of it in gas engines, which probably cost no more to install originally than coal-consuming engines, steam can be generated as cheaply as by the use of West Virginia and Pennsylvania coal. Now, that is of vast importance in a State like Texas, which is inadequately supplied with coal, and what is true of Texas is true of a great part of the West.

With reference to the observation made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], I have made inquiry and my information is that the report of the survey on the coal from Kansas was to the effect that it did not make satisfactory blast-furnace coke. That was in their report, I am informed. They do make coke in the vicinity of Pittsburg, Kans., which is entirely satisfactory for the smelting of zinc, the purpose to which it is mainly devoted, I believe, but it is not satisfactory for blast-furnace work. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the experiments conducted at St. Louis in the coal testing have added enough value to the lignite beds in two or three States in the West to justify the cost of the Geological Survey from the moment of its foundation down to the present time, and I do believe, and

I state this from observation, and close observation at that, of the plant in St. Louis, that there is no branch of the service which has been of so much practical, commercial benefit to the country at large as the coal testing, and I sincerely hope that the House will not only permit those tests to go on, but that it will extend the experiments whenever it may be necessary to make a showing of the latent business resources of the country.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, increasing this appropriation from $100,000 to $250,000. This debate has served to illustrate the extent to which the Federal Government is asked to go in the matter of the expenditure of public money for the benefit and to promote the interests of private enterprise. The vote will no doubt show the power of private enterprise in the matter of controlling sufficient votes on both sides of the House to obtain any appropriation deemed necessary to enable the Government to do certain work these enterprises should do. The coal tests that have been conducted under the appropriations heretofore made, as testified to by Members of this House representing coal districts, have been tests of coal produced by private corporations and for the purpose of determining for their benefit the heat units or the relative units of heat which different coals produced by different producers contain. I want to ask gentleman of this House what governmental function is performed by the ascertainment of the relative heat units of coal produced by this man from this mine or of coal produced by another man from a different mine. When the gentleman in charge of these tests was before the committee one of the chief reasons he advanced for the $250,000 appropriation was the fact that these investigations were developing the utility of the by-products of coal. He also said that the results of these tests would materially enhance the profits of the coking companies of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, if we are going into the business of developing the relative values of natural products produced by different corporations, or into the business at the Government expense of investigating the by-products of great corporations in order to show how their profits may be increased by the utilization of these by-products, then, I submit, you can appropriate money for any purpose in the interest of any individual or in the interest of any corporation. When we once commence upon this plan of governmental development of private enterprise there is no point at which we can stop. The committee felt that in appropriating or recommending $100,000 for this purpose we were doing all that could be reasonably asked for the development of the coal deposits and the intrinsic value of the coal on the public domain. We did it in the hope that the investigation that was now going on might be completed during the next fiscal year in so far as the Government itself was interested in developing the fuel resources of the public domain. We did not intend that a dollar of that amount should be expended for the testing of coal at Government expense for private parties.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, if it is not a proper function of government to authorize some bureau or department to make scientific investigations to determine the value of coal, why is an appropriation made at all?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman evidently did not hear my statement. I don't think there ought to be any appropriation, but the majority of the Committee on Appropriations did not agree with me, and I agreed to stand by the $100,000 in favor of which the committee reported in the belief that that amount would be expended in determining the value of the coal and lignite that has been discovered on the public lands of the United States, which is the public domain, and that to that extent and to that extent alone could we justify the appropriation. Mr. Chairman, I know the tendency of the times is toward government aid to private enterprise. But it is wrong. It should be stopped. It is demoralizing the individual citizen and pauperizing the States. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, if my time is about to expire, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. If you can justify the expenditure of this appropriation for the purpose of determining the value of coal mines, then you can justify the expenditure of the public money for the investigation of gold mines and silver mines. There is no distinction between the investigation and the development of a gold mine and a coal mine. And I repeat that it is not part of the business of this Government to engage in private enterprise. It is the duty of the Government, State and national, to govern and to allow the people under that government the opportunity of developing the resources of the nation. Beyond this the Government can not legitimately go. [Applause.]

Mr. DIXON of Montana. Mr. Chairman, in reply to an inquiry made by the gentleman from Maine a few minutes ago as to a specific case where this appropriation has resulted in the development of the coal fields of this country, I want to make a statement to this committee which I do not believe that many of the Members know at this time. As has been stated by my friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], in enumerating the great and vast fields of lignite in the western part of this country, the Director of the Geological Survey reports about 145,000 square miles of lignite. At the present time it is practically valueless. The Government yet owns 70,000 square miles of these lignite coal fields, that with the present treatment of the lignite coals renders them practically useless for commercial purposes. Under this appropriation heretofore made, I now state to the gentleman from Maine that during the investigation in St. Louis the Geological Survey did determine this one thing, that by taking the lignite coal, which at present is of no value or of little value, they have invented, I might say, an engine for driving the gas from the coal and using the gas directly in a gas engine. From these experiments they have determined that this use of the gas direct from the lignite coal produces two and one-half times the power that the best bituminous coal does in the old-fashioned way of making steam under a steam engine. They have determined that this great 150,000 square miles of lignite coal is equally as valuable for power purposes as the best coals in western Virginia or western Pennsylvania. This is one thing these gentlemen have performed with the bagatelle that has been appropriated here for the past three years. [Applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. I move that the debate close on this amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR rose.

Mr. TAWNEY. How much time does the gentleman from Ohio desire?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would not want to belittle myself by speaking less than ten minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAWNEY. I move that the debate close in ten minutes, and that the time be allowed to the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not make that motion.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota——

Mr. TAWNEY. We will have to close the debate on this.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. As a substitute to the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate on the pending paragraph be closed in twenty-five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado moves to amend the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota by inserting "twenty-five minutes" in place of "ten minutes;" so that the debate will close in twenty-five minutes. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 50.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota to close the debate upon this paragraph and amendments thereto in ten minutes.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I will only use five minutes. It is my opinion that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is mistaken in his estimate of the public importance of the investigation provided for in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I would not advocate this proposition if I thought that the benefit, in a whole or in a majority, to go from it was to go to private individuals or private corporations.

I represent a district in which upward of 40 per cent of the good grade of coal production of Ohio is mined. It is a coal and of a condition that needs no aid from the Government. All the tests necessary for the establishment of the character of what is called the Hocking and Sunday Creek coal have already been established, and I have no interest in this resolution. But, Mr. Chairman, the question of the coal supply of the United States is a very grave and serious one. So much so that I learn with great interest the fact that it is proposed very shortly, as appears by the newspaper press—I have not time to have it read—that it is the purpose of the Government, the Executive Department, to ask legislation at the hands of Congress during this Congress to prevent the acquisition of the title to any of the 40,000,000 acres of coal and oil lands now belonging to the Government of the United States by private parties for the purpose of holding on to, in the interest of the public, all the remaining deposits of coal.

Not many years ago, Mr. Chairman, within the memory of the gentleman from Minnesota, we had a condition in regard to the production of coal in the United States that was extremely suggestive to the people of the United States. The fathering of one of the great developments of anthracite by a great combination of operators, precipitating a strike among the producers of the coal in the other deposits of the country which brought to the mind of the people of this country that there could not be too much coal and that there could not be too great an understanding of the character of the coal.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the Government of the United States has tested over and over again—that is, often—the character of the coal deposits. It was the Government of the United States that made known to the owners of merchant ships—the few that we have—the character of what is called "Pocahontas coal;" and it has come about that every trial of every war ship of the United States and every great merchant ship is carried on specifically under the provision that the test shall be made by Pocahontas coal or its equivalent.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Are you aware of the fact that the Navy made these tests, and that the Navy has a coal-testing plant, and wherever there is new coal discovered anywhere in the world samples of those coals are submitted to the Navy and the Navy makes the test; and they made the test that developed the value of Pocahontas coal?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I know that, and have had occasion, growing out of my interest in a discovery in my own district long ago, and a discovery made by some young men in West Virginia in whom I felt an interest, to know that the Navy Department had made the test that the gentleman has spoken of. But at the same time, in connection with this mutilated department, that we are apparently assailing from every direction, and which I hope will be either redeemed from the operations of the Committee on Appropriations or abolished, I think that this extensive and widely disseminated interest can be better looked after than it can be in the Navy Department.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman pardon me again?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does he not think this is simply a duplication of service in respect to the testing of coal in the United States?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, if the gentleman while at the head of this committee, and I trust that he may be for a long time—several Congresses—will get rid of duplication in all Departments with as much vigor as he is trying to get rid of it in this, I will say "amen" to his efforts.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 44.

Mr. TAWNEY. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. TAWNEY. May I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported, so that Members may know what they are voting on?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment to the amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and tellers reported—ayes 83, noes 45.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment as amended. The Clerk will report the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The question was taken; and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuation of the survey of the public lands that have been or may hereafter be designated as forest reserves, $100,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. GILLETT of California. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 77, in line 21, strike out "one hundred" and insert in lieu thereof "one hundred and thirty."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. GILLETT of California. Mr. Chairman, I present this amendment because I believe that it is necessary that the large area now included in our forest reserves should be surveyed as quickly as possible, to enable the Agricultural Department properly to handle it and to protect the interests of the people living in the immediate vicinity of these forest reserves.

At the present time our forest reserves embrace about 100,000,000 acres of land. Of this amount, about 44,000,000 acres have been mapped and surveyed. Within the last year we added about 36,000 square miles of territory—timbered land—to our forest reserves, and we have surveyed only about 7,824 square miles. At the present time there is a demand upon the Geological Survey for a survey of over 3,000 additional square miles. Now, if we are to realize anything out of the forest reserves by the sale of the timber or by the leasing of the land for grazing purposes, it is very important that the boundaries should be marked. At present these boundaries are uncertain. A great many of the lines run through the mountains, where the surveys are very incomplete, and it is the purpose of the Government so to mark the boundary lines that people can readily know where they are and whether or not they are trespassing upon the public lands. Now, upon these forest reserves there are supervisors and rangers, placed there by the Government for the purpose of protecting the lands from trespassers and those going upon them for grazing or for timber, and unless these boundaries are well fixed and plain there will be endless trouble, and perhaps people who go there innocently may be arrested.

I had some conversation with the head of the Bureau of Forestry in relation to this matter. I did so because I am much interested, and the people whom I represent are interested in this question. Nearly one-half the territory embraced in my Congressional district lies within forest reserves. I wanted to know just exactly the reason of the Department why they wanted this survey made quickly and without any unnecessary delay. At my request, Mr. Pinchot, of the Bureau of Forestry, made this statement, which I will read for the benefit of the Members of this House:

Decrease in the special fund appropriated for the mapping of forest reserves would have harmful results not only in still further delaying the mapping of reserves, but also in applying to reserve maps the scale of approximately one-half inch to the mile used by the Survey in its regular topographic work. A map of this small scale is of little use in the administration of forest reserves except for general reconnoissance purposes. A scale of at least 1 inch to the mile is usually required, while in many reserves where active work in timber sales and in forest planting is going on a scale of at least 2 inches to the mile is necessary.

To sum up, the fund hitherto appropriated for reserve mapping is already too small to provide promptly maps urgently needed for the development of the reserves. To reduce it still further would be to tie up the resources of the reserves correspondingly, for maps are absolutely essential to the development of these resources. Without them, in most cases development can not even begin. To take money from the fund for mapping the forest reserves would be to reduce the actual income from forest reserves by many times that amount. Without forest maps the reserves can not be made self-supporting.

[The time of Mr. GILLETT of California having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended three minutes.]

Mr. GILLETT of California. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the appropriation made last year was for $130,000. I see no reason why the same appropriation should not be made for the coming year. The work is of vast importance. Large tracts of land have been segregated from the public domain, and it is necessary that we should know just exactly where we are. It is of importance that the boundary line should be run, and the Department having this work in charge insists that it shall be done as quickly as possible. It seems to me to be asking but little to increase the amount to what it was a year ago. I therefore ask the House to adopt this amendment to give to the Geological Survey the same amount of money appropriated last year, because it is necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a very few words in opposition to this amendment. The forest reserves of the United States constitute one-twentieth part of the total area of the United States. In other words, the other portion of the United States is nineteen times as large in area as the forest reserves.

The House has now fixed the appropriation for all the rest of the United States at $350,000 for the next year, and if we should give exactly the same proportion for the area of the forest reserves they would be entitled to $18,400. But the committee did not feel that it was possible to thus radically reduce this item so as to proceed regularly and uniformly with the forest reserves and the property outside of the forest reserves. We have given the forest reserves in this bill five times as much, relatively, as is given to any other place in the United States, even by the amount fixed by the House increasing the appropriation fixed by the committee. Unless the House wants to carry on the work more than five times as fast as it is possible to carry it on by the appropriation fixed by the House in the topographical survey for the rest of the United States, this amendment ought not to pass.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in eight minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moves that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in eight minutes.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I come from a region of country where we have large areas within forest reserves. I appreciate the value, the importance, and the necessity of these surveys within forest reserves. I think they should be prosecuted diligently, continuously to a conclusion, but I am of the opinion that the amount carried in the bill is sufficient to carry on the work as rapidly as it is necessary to carry it on in the interest of the public service, in the interest of the Government and of the people. It should be remembered that these surveys are topographical in their nature. The rectangular surveys within the forest reserves are made by the General Land Office, and when settlers go upon forest reserves and settle, and there is a necessity of surveying out the lands held by them, that work is executed by the General Land Office, under an appropriation of $400,000 for surveying the public lands.

Considerably less than one-half of the area now within the forest reserves has been surveyed. About 7,000 acres were surveyed last year under the appropriation of $130,000. In all probability about that area or a little less could be surveyed with the appropriation carried in the bill, and at that rate in about seven or eight years at the most we would have all the present forest reserve area surveyed and completely mapped with the appropriation as it now stands. In my opinion it is better to proceed steadily and continuously with this work, rather than attempt a large increase for a year or two and then possibly have a considerable reduction. The work can be done to the best advantage with an organization kept at about the same size all the time. My experience is that a largely increased appropriation forced from Congress is likely to be followed by a reduction below what the service actually requires. Therefore I am of the opinion that the amount should not be increased.

I want to call attention to the fact that it is quite possible to travel too fast in carrying out one of the purposes of this survey, and I think some work has been done in that line which might better have been somewhat delayed. This item is not only for survey of the lands within forest reserves, but of the boundaries of the forest reserves also. The boundaries of most of the forest reserves of the country are constantly being changed by the addition or elimination of territory. It will be many years before the proper boundaries of many of the forest reserves are definitely and finally settled. Until there is a definite and final settlement of the proper boundaries of forest reserves the boundaries should not be definitely surveyed and permanently monumented.

I know of one locality where the boundaries of a forest reserve were surveyed at considerable expense and where what was once the boundary is now public land for some distance, and at another part of the line the present is some distance beyond the former and marked boundary and does not indicate the present boundary of the reserve at all. This condition is very confusing, both to settlers and to the forestry service. That survey should have been delayed until the boundaries of the forest reserve were finally and definitely settled. That can only occur after careful investigation, after settlements have extended to the boundaries, and the proper limits of the reserve have been fixed, both in the interest of the people of the region and of the service.

Mr. GILLETT of California. Does the gentleman know how far the settlements extend to the boundaries of the public lands now set aside in California and Oregon?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Wyoming does not pretend to know what the boundaries of the forest reserves in California are, and neither does anyone else, I presume, know them all.

Mr. GILLETT of California. I want to say that that is just what we want to do, we want them pointed out so that a man need not be arrested for trespassing upon them.

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield any further, because my time is limited. The ordinary blazing and marking of the boundaries, the ordinary marking of forest reserves to indicate the boundaries, so that settlers and stock growers may know where they are, this can, and is, done by the forestry guards, by the rangers, and can be done without an expensive, permanent survey and monumenting, which is proper and valuable when the reserves are finally and definitely defined. I doubt if there is a forest reserve in the United States to-day the boundaries of which will not be changed very considerably. There may be places where the time has now arrived——

Mr. GILLETT of California. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GILLETT of California. Then, Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GILLETT of California. Having offered this amendment, I want to know if I am not entitled to close the debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Not under the limitation imposed by the committee. The committee, by vote, has fixed the time for closing debate.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be misunderstood. I am not criticising what has been done further than to point out the fact, known to every man who lives in the public-lands States, that the boundaries of forest reserves are being constantly and necessarily changed, and that therefore this expensive, final, definite surveying and monumenting of boundaries should be done only when there is little probability that the boundary will be changed. The marking of the boundary by tree blazing or otherwise, so that people in the locality may be informed, can be done by any forest guard who is worth his salt.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GILLETT of California rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Wyoming to have the floor.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Has not the Chair already recognized the gentleman from California for three minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I thought the gentleman from Wyoming had consumed the eight minutes of time.

Mr. MONDELL. I understood that I was recognized for eight minutes, but I have no desire to go on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had no power to recognize the gentleman for eight minutes, because we are working under the five-minute rule. The gentleman, under that rule, was recognized for five minutes. His time has expired. The Chair so stated to him, and thereupon the gentleman from California was recognized for the remaining three minutes.

Mr. GILLETT of California. Mr. Chairman, it is well known that a person who goes upon public land and trespasses there and removes timber from it has committed a crime. It is very important that the people who are settling the country and developing it should have some knowledge of where the boundaries run, so that they shall not lay themselves liable to arrest and prosecution by the Government. It will take from eight to ten years to make the necessary surveys, even if we appropriate $130,000 a year. It seems to me that this is a very small amount of money. We ought to make the survey as quickly as possible. It is very important to all concerned that the boundaries should be established.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry? When these forest reserves are created by proclamation of the President, are not their boundaries fixed—not the exact boundaries, but their general boundaries—and can anybody make an entry on public land in the Land Office within the forest reserves and within that boundary?

Mr. GILLETT of California. I want to state this, that when our surveys were made through the mountains they were very imperfectly made. No man can go there to-day and find where the survey was made. They were in some instances fraudulently made. Under an act that passed the House the other day, people have a right to go on the forest reserves and take up homesteads where the land is agricultural. They have a right to know where the boundaries are. They have a right to locate and to settle there, and they have the right to be protected when they go there. It is the duty of the Government to fix the boundaries so that we shall know what our rights are and what our property is, so that we shall not be liable to arrest every time we turn around by some supervisor or some ranger. I suppose if this bill provided for the fixing of boundaries for the coal lands in Wyoming the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] would vote for $200,000 instead of $100,000. The law-abiding people of the country want to know where the boundaries are. The law-breaking people of the country don't care to know where they are. Our people are law-abiding, and they want the Government to fix the boundaries so that we can know where our property is located and can know where we may go without trespassing.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TAWNEY) there were—ayes 29, noes 45.

Mr. GILLETT of California. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California demands tellers. As many as are in favor of tellers will rise and remain standing until counted. [After counting.] Fifteen gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number, and tellers are denied.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter, in the settlement of the accounts of deceased officers or enlisted men of the Army, where the amount due the decedent's estate is less than $500 and no demand is presented by a duly appointed legal representative of the estate, the accounting officers may allow the amount found due to the decedent's widow or legal heirs in the following order of precedence: First, to the widow; second, if decedent left no widow, or the widow be dead at time of settlement, then to the children or their issue, per stirpes; third, if no widow or descendants, then to the father and mother in equal parts, provided the father has not abandoned the support of his family, in which case to the mother alone; fourth, if either the father or mother be dead, then to the one surviving; fifth, if there be no widow, child, father, or mother at the date of settlement, then to the brothers and sisters and children of deceased brothers and sisters, per stirpes: Provided, That this act shall not be so construed as to prevent payment from the amount due the decedent's estate of funeral expenses, provided a claim therefor is presented by the person or persons who actually paid the same before settlement by the accounting officers.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the point of order, I would like to inquire the purpose of that legislation. It seems to be new. I refer to the item on page 136 about the settlement of accounts of deceased soldiers.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman that that provision is in accordance with the practice to-day, which practice has existed for a long time, but under the present Auditor for the War Department, there being no statutory authorization for the distribution of this money as it is now distributed where the amount is less than $500, he declines to make the distribution and insists that he is right. I personally think he is. This provision is merely to legalize the present practice.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It legalizes the present practice?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For erection of court-house, with fireproof vaults, at Fairbanks, Alaska, to replace the one destroyed by fire.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 139, line 14, after the word "fire," insert the words "fifteen thousand dollars."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GROSVENOR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19432) to authorize additional aids to navigation in the Light-House Establishment.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6443. An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell to the city of Los Angeles, Cal., and granting rights in, over, and through the Sierra Forest Reserve, the Santa Barbara Forest Reserve, and the San Gabriel Timber Land Reserve, California, to the city of Los Angeles, Cal.;

S. 6462. An act granting lands to the State of Wisconsin for forestry purposes;

S. 6301. An act granting an increase of pension to William C. Long; and

S. 4899. An act granting an increase of pension to Ann Thompson.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 19816. An act to authorize the Georgia, Florida and Alabama Railway Company to construct three railroad bridges across the Chattahoochee River, one at or near the city of Eufaula, Ala., and two between said city of Eufaula and the city of Columbus, Ga.;

H. R. 19815. An act to authorize the Georgia, Florida and Alabama Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Chattahoochee River between Columbus, Ga., and Franklin, Ga.;

H. R. 16125. An act authorizing a license and permit to the Corinth and Shiloh Electric Railway Company to construct a track or tracks through the Shiloh National Park, and to operate electric cars thereon; and

H. R. 10106. An act providing for the setting aside for governmental purposes of certain ground in Hilo, Hawaii.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return the bill (S. 1510) entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to Byron K. May."

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Defense of suits before Spanish Treaty Claims Commission: For salaries and expenses in defense of claims before the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission, including salaries of Assistant Attorney-General in charge as fixed by law, and of assistant attorneys and necessary employees in Washington, D. C., or elsewhere, to be selected and their compensation fixed by the Attorney-General, to be expended under his direction, so much of the provisions of the act of March 2, 1901, providing for the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission, as are in conflict herewith notwithstanding, $92,000, of which not exceeding $200 may be expended for law books and books of reference.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to raise a point of order to this section. As I understand—and if I am wrong in this, I will be corrected by the committee—this provision authorizes the expenditure of this money in a way that is not now authorized by law, because it expressly says that this is to be expended, so much of the provisions of the law of March 2, 1901, as are in conflict therewith notwithstanding. In other words, it does change those provisions.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the reason that I wish to make this point of order is not that I am so very anxious about the manner in which this money should be expended, but it does seem to me that the long continuance of great expense for the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission should in some way be stopped. If it can be stopped by a point of order, I would be glad to assist in stopping it in that way. I do not know how far the members of the Appropriations Committee have jurisdiction over the amount to be allowed and how far these items may be fixed by express law, but I apprehend that to some extent these allowances are not made in conformity with the provisions of the statute law, but are allowances made for the purpose which, it seems to me, should be in some way stopped.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I think I can explain in a word.

Mr. PERKINS. I shall be glad to hear any explanation.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman from New York is in error. The act of March 2, 1901, established the Commission, and in that act the permanent specific appropriation of $50,000 was made which goes on automatically from year to year. The appropriation bills since 1901 have carried, under the title "Defense of suits before the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission," an amount additional to the $50,000 permanently appropriated. That $50,000 goes on, as I have said, automatically from year to year, and this language is employed in this act in order that it might not be construed to cut out the $50,000 which is permanently appropriated. To make that more clear, the $50,000 goes on from year to year, and, in addition, this $112,000 is granted for the purpose of defending the suits before the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission.

Mr. PERKINS. Under what authority?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Under the authority of the statute.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not see, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman has replied to the point of order. The Spanish Commission, of course, has been created by law, and still continues to exist, until such time, which I hope will not be long, as it may be abolished. That appropriation, of course, is authorized by law, but the gentleman has referred to no provision of law which authorizes the appropriation of $92,000 to be expended by counsel or other officers in the defense of suits before that Commission. The Commission must act automatically, as he says. The Government must pay the $50,000 due the Commission, but that does not authorize the Appropriations Committee or this body to appropriate for an expense, to be incurred in the hearings before that Commission, of $92,000, or any other sum of money. We must pay for the Commission, but we are not bound to appropriate, and there is no provision of law that requires us to appropriate for the expense of the hearings before the Commission. We can leave them there in their own dignity, paid, but not acting.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I thought I made it clear, but it seems I have not. The act of 1901 established this Commission, and in that act provision was made for the defense of these claims. In that act they were to be under charge of the Attorney-General, who was authorized to appoint his force for the purpose of defending the claims before the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission. Therefore there is authority of law for the defense of these claims in the organic act. Now, it was thought when the act was passed $50,000 would be a sufficient appropriation. Later it was discovered that, owing to the expense of taking testimony in Cuba, much more would be needed, and hence this $112,000 was appropriated subsequently from year to year.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. PERKINS. I do.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. One hundred and twelve thousand dollars is appropriated for preparing defense to suits that are being prosecuted. Is that correct?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. That is correct.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Are there any suits being prosecuted at this time?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Yes; there are now, according to the last report of the Commission, some 321 cases pending before the Commission.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But is it not a fact that these cases have been on the docket or have been filed for some years, and that there is no one now pressing them, and the Commission is practically without anything to do?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. That is hardly germane to the point we are now discussing, but I will say to the gentleman it is my judgment that——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I thought it was germane to the extent of $112,000.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts (continuing). The Commission, in my judgment, might very well be abolished, and I have introduced a bill for that purpose. But, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I felt obliged to vote for this appropriation, because if the Commission is abolished by this Congress on September 2, 1906, as my bill provides, the appropriation, at all events, should be made, in order to enable them to continue their work until that time. If Congress should abolish the Commission, the unused portion of that appropriation would be covered back into the Treasury. If it does not abolish the Commission, the appropriation will be needed.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman says "continue their work." Will he specify any work they are doing?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. It would not take long to tell how much they are doing.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to discuss the point of order, because there may be a line or two in this language that is subject to the point of order. I do want to appeal to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] to withhold this point of order. This bill as passed carries with it $50,000 a year. This pays the judges, if I may style them such, the commissioners, the clerks, or the functionaries, in this quasi-judicial tribunal, or perhaps this fully judicial tribunal.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Is the gentleman thinking of the $50,000 now?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Then that is correct.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Now the proposition is, with this Commission continuing in existence and drawing $50,000 a year in salaries for themselves and their subordinates, to strike out all appropriations for the Government counsel. This is to absolutely insure that during the fiscal year these Commissioners and their subordinates shall continue to draw their salaries from the Federal Treasury, and that nothing whatever shall be done in their court.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Was it not kept in that way for the last three or four years?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will say, in answer to the gentleman, that I think he is very far from correct.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is it not true that they have not tried a single case on its merits?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is not correct.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is it not true that all the cases disposed of before that Commission have gone out through motion or demurrer?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is not correct. But even if it were correct——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The information contained in the hearings is not very accurate if that is not correct.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. About the time of the hearings, to my knowledge, an inquiry started on which I think the arguments alone consumed something like two weeks. I am stating from memory as to the time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But, as a matter of fact, no case has been tried on its merits in that court?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If I may be permitted to suggest——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is that a fact?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No; I think that is not true, but that nine-tenths have been disposed of on their merits.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The gentleman is in error in that. Fully nine-tenths of the cases have been disposed of on demurrer and motions to dismiss or for lack of prosecution. Certainly not more than 10 per cent have been disposed of upon the merits.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman and myself differ as to words and not as to meaning. What I mean to say is that the precedents established in the decisions of this tribunal, as shown in the hearings, disposed of about nine-tenths of these cases, and in that sense nine-tenths of the cases have been disposed of on their merits. Now, I want to call the attention of the House to some of the peculiarities of this whole matter.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Now, right there. If it is true that propositions of law have been laid down that dispose of nine-tenths of these cases, upon what theory can the gentleman justify an additional appropriation of $112,000 for the purpose of taking testimony and making further defense in cases that are four years old and more on the docket?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. These appropriations, or part of them, are for the taking of testimony in Cuba and Spain. Twenty thousand dollars of this money is for the purpose of taking Government testimony in Spain and in Cuba. The other $92,000 is to cover the expense of the attorneys of the United States and the agents of the United States in Spain and in Cuba who have searched and are searching for evidence for the defense in these cases.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman, while not discussing the point of order, tell the committee some of the things that these agents and attorneys are doing?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If the gentleman will allow me to proceed, I will tell the House with great pleasure some of the difficulties which have confronted this Commission. When the United States representatives went to Paris to negotiate the treaty of peace with Spain, they took with them $29,000,000 of claims against the Spanish Government that they tried to utilize in making a settlement. For the purpose of settling with Spain we claimed that these $29,000,000 of claims were genuine bona fide claims, and then we assumed all claims of Americans against Spain in favor of citizens of the United States. Of course, immediately we turned right square around and claimed that none of these $29,000,000 worth of claims that we were trying to collect off Spain were valid, but claimed they were invalid, put these cases before the Spanish Claims Commission, and were required to take a position directly at variance with the position officially taken by our own Government in the negotiation of the treaty of Paris.

That is not all. We had persistently refused to recognize that a state of war existed in Cuba. We had refused to recognize the Cuban people as belligerents, and yet as soon as these claims, which had grown to $60,000,000, were filed against the Government of the United States we turned square around and planted ourselves upon the proposition that a state of war was raging over a territory 700 miles long in Cuba and that the injuries inflicted on the claimants were directly caused by such war. So that the task intrusted to the counsel for the American Government before the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission was the task of repudiating everything the United States has contended for at Paris and everything the United States had contended for before we took possession of the island of Cuba.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. All that is far from a justification for five or six stenographers and interpreters here in Washington, located in and about the Commission rooms here on H street. Do you know what they are doing?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am not going to assume to know what every clerk under this Commission is doing individually.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. A part of this appropriation is for their salaries, is it not?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am going to answer you. As a matter of fact, when we concluded to change our minds, and that a state of war did exist in the island of Cuba for years before we took possession of the island, the first thing to do was to get evidence of that fact.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; but what has that to do with the present question whether this appropriation shall be further continued? The question is not what has been done in the past, but whether there is any necessity or propriety of doing more in the present and the future.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If I could proceed without interruption I think I could make it plain.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman would have to make it plainer than he has.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa decline to yield?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I prefer to proceed, but I do not decline to yield. Now, it was not a question whether war existed on the whole 700 miles, because these losses were not sustained all at one place, nor were the losses, so to speak, affected by the state of war at any place except where the injury was inflicted; that is to say, as each claimant's case came up, in these $60,000,000 worth of claims, it was necessary——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It was necessary for us to take up each man's case and attempt to demonstrate that a state of war existed at the place where the loss was inflicted at the time the loss was incurred. In order to do that we had to take the testimony of Spanish officers. We did not know who those officers were. For a long time after the war our relations were not so pleasant with Spain that the Spanish Government was cooperating to advise us just which officers could give us the information.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I ask the gentleman a question just there?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Have you succeeded yet in establishing the fact as to whether war did exist?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. At each given point, no. We have taken the evidence as to many points and many days.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. How many points yet remain to cover?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am not claiming such detailed knowledge of the progress of this litigation as to be able to inform the gentleman upon that. I have informed him that nine-tenths of these cases are practically disposed of, almost all of them favorably to the Government of the United States, in the face of the fact that we ourselves vouched for them at the time of the negotiation of the treaty of Paris.

Now, there is about one-tenth of this business undisposed of. It will be disposed of, so say the Commission and the legal branch, in about a year, and here it is suggested that at this hour in the transaction of this business, without abolishing the Commission, we shall simply strike out the pay of every legal officer of this Government in charge of the defense of those claims in order that the salaries of the Commissioners and their subordinates may go on and no business be transacted and at the end of the fiscal year have no progress made over what has been made at this hour. I submit it is against the public interest. It is destructive of the public interest. It is wasteful of the public money to keep the court going but to refuse the money for the counsel who are in defense of the claims against the American Government.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Do you not think that every right and interest of the Government could be subserved by transferring these claims to the Court of Claims and that we could still make money by paying the salaries of the Commission for another year?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Every dollar provided in this bill would have to be expended for counsel to defend the cases in the Court of Claims. You would not save a penny of this money. You would save the salaries of the Commission, covered by the $50,000 appropriation. But I want to say that the law creating the Commission provided that after two years the Commission should die, except as extended from time to time for six months by order of the President of the United States, and whenever the President of the United States fails to give his order extending the life for six months this Commission dies, and he will fail to give that order whenever the public service will be bettered by abolishing this Commission; and I think it would be folly to transfer these cases from a court that has studied the questions of international law involved, to some of which I have given an examination myself and know to be exceedingly difficult, and turn the cases over to a court that is not familiar with the subject-matter of the litigation.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly to insist upon a point of order when my friend from Iowa says that it is folly to do so. If I thought there was any benefit in it, if my experience did not show that when a commission is once created it never ends, unless by positive act of Congress the thing is forced to come to an end, I would not make this point. This Commission has gone on in desuetude that has become more innocuous, but not less costly, every year. Finally, when attention is turned to it the gentleman says the judges come in and say that in another year we will come to an end. I do not believe it. I do not believe that one-quarter of the Members of the House believe it. But if now this provision be passed, the pretense of work can be kept up on the part of the Commission, but if it is stricken out it will quicken the pulse of the House to pass the bills that are already pending and to do away with the court itself. My friend says that the judges have little to do now; but so long as we allow them to remain they will draw $50,000 a year. Is that any reason why we should appropriate $92,000 more and increase the expenses of an organization admitted on all sides to have long survived its usefulness? Mr. Chairman, I insist on my point of order.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Will not the gentleman reserve his point of order long enough for me to make an explanation?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss the matter briefly. I am in sympathy with the sentiments of the gentleman from New York, and believe that this Commission ought to be abolished at the earliest possible date. But I think it would not be wise for Congress to strike out the appropriation for the defense of the claims while the Commission itself is left in existence. If we succeed in striking out the $92,000, the Commission will stand, and the appropriation of $50,000 for the expense of the Commission itself will remain.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. In a moment. The result will be that the Commission will not have any work before it to perform, but will be continued under the law with its salaries preserved. Now, while the Commission exists we ought to make a provision for what is the only useful branch of the service, in my judgment, namely, that branch that establishes the defense to claims and which is under the immediate charge of the Assistant Attorney-General. Now I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PERKINS. Does the gentleman think anything would have more effect to hasten action in reporting the bill which the gentleman himself has introduced to abolish this Commission than just such action as here will be taken, and does he not believe, does he not fear, that in the absence of such action his bill and similar bills will sleep the sleep of the just, and that this Commission will be continued for many a long day if not many a long year?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. If I did concur with the gentleman in that belief, I would not have voted for the appropriation as it appears in the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. But we know that an item being in this appropriation bill is no evidence that any particular member of the committee voted in favor of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. It may have that appearance after what has taken place here in the last few days, but it is not always true. This Commission was established in 1901. Under the law in six months after its organization, which was effected April, 1901, all the claims had to be filed, and there was a provision that for just cause shown other claims could be filed in the following six months. Under that limitation all claims were filed which can possibly be brought before the Commission for adjudication. The total number was 542. There have been 221 disposed of. Three hundred and twenty-one, or a large majority of them, still remain to be adjudicated. The claims aggregated some $60,000,000 in amount. The number disposed of aggregated $10,000,000. There is some $50,000,000 worth of claims remaining. Now, the Commission can not disposes of these claims unless the testimony is taken in Spain and in Cuba. If this item is stricken out, there will be no provision for taking the testimony in Spain and in Cuba, and the result will be that the Commission will be left standing with magnificent salaries provided for them and with absolutely nothing to do.

Mr. PERKINS. Does not the gentleman believe it to be a fact, does he not know it to be the fact, that of this great total of $50,000,000 of claims, 95 per cent, like the great volume of most damage claims, will never be pressed, and are of no possible validity, as is known to the claimants just as much as to anyone else?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. On the contrary, I think it is the hope of the claimants to get favorable action upon their claims.

Mr. PERKINS. Then why haven't they pressed their claims in all these years?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The reason, to be very frank with the gentleman, is because the Commission has laid down certain rules of decision which the claimants believe will cause the cases to be decided adversely to them. For that reason they have sought in every way possible to postpone action upon their cases, and the Commission has been very accommodating to these claimants, probably realizing that the longer they postpone action the longer they will be allowed to draw their salaries. At all events, it seems to me that the claimants and the Commission are now simply playing a waiting game in order to see what Congress may do. There is a bill pending now for certiorari, under which these claimants hope to get relief. There is another bill pending, introduced by myself, calling for the abolition of the Commission on the 2d of September, 1906, and the transfer of the remaining claims to the Court of Claims upon that day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I don't know whether this bill for certiorari has passed the House or not.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. It is in the Senate, I am informed. It has not passed the House.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If it should become law, it simply probably opens up not only cases that have already been decided, but probably would render valid quite a number of claims now pending which would come within the line of suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I do not care to discuss the certiorari bill now, but I do not think the gentleman is quite right in that assumption. If I am correctly informed, the bill provides certiorari only in those cases that are pending, but I will say this in candor to the gentleman, that if that bill should pass I think it would be immediately followed by another bill asking that the claims already decided adversely could be resubmitted.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The purpose of the bill, and the gentleman behind the bill, is to reverse the rule of law laid down by the Commission, and if the Supreme Court should reverse that rule, then you have another avenue of litigation opened up. That is the logic of it.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I think there is no doubt that would result if the certiorari bill should pass. Personally I hope it will not pass. I trust the committee of which the gentleman is a distinguished member will do its duty and have a meeting on the bill to abolish the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission and report that bill to the House at this session.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. My impression is that they have already reported the other bill favorably.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The gentleman means the certiorari bill in the Senate.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The certiorari bill gives them the right of appeal, does it not?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Practically the right of appeal.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. It makes no final decision.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Oh, no; it gives a review to the Supreme Court, which may remand the case to the Commission again for further action.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I had the honor of being a member of the committee that reported this Spanish treaty claims law.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Well, I think that is a very doubtful honor. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. I think it is, too. I know it was the thought of that committee that it could not last long. Are we continuing this Commission simply because those who have claims to present are failing to present them? Can not we abolish that Commission by amendment on this bill?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I wish the gentleman would make that attempt, and I trust he will succeed.

Mr. SIMS. Then the gentleman would not make the point of order.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I assure the gentleman that I would not. It is true, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] says, that when this bill was passed by Congress in the Fifty-sixth Congress it fixed the limit of two years for the winding up of this Commission's work, and no one dreamed then that it would take longer than two years to dispose of all these claims. In order to guard against all possible contingencies, a proviso was included giving the President the right to extend the life of the Commission for six months at a time, and since March 2, 1903, he has extended its life six times under that provision. I remember very well the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] at that time. He was quite convinced, as were the Members of the House, that this Commission could dispose of this work much more speedily than the Court of Claims. The argument was advanced that the Court of Claims was congested, that it was not up with its work, and that great injustice would result to these claimants if the claims were submitted to that tribunal. Subsequent events have shown that Congress was wrong in that assumption and that the Court of Claims would have disposed of these cases far more speedily than this Commission has done.

Mr. PERKINS. Did the gentleman ever, in his experience as a lawyer or as a politician, know of any commission that disposed of business with any degree of promptitude?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman that the tendency of all temporary commissions is to make their tenure permanent, particularly where the salary is large. In this case each of the five Commissioners receives a salary of $5,000 a year, and it seems to me they have stretched the law to the utmost in providing the salaries for special counsel and assistants, etc.

The annual salary roll of this Commission is about $114,000, and I would like to read the roll briefly. There are five Commissioners at $5,000; then there are five Commissioners to take testimony, one at $2,500 and one at $2,100 and three at $8 per diem. There is one clerk at $3,500, two assistant clerks at $2,000, and one at $14,000; six interpreters at $1,800; seven stenographers at $1,200; one typewriter at $1,200; three messengers, two at $720 each, and one at $1,000; one Assistant Attorney-General at $5,000, and one special counsel at $5,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe that the Commission has not done all the work that it ought to have done. In the first year, 1901, it did not dispose of a single case. In the second year it disposed of only two cases, and those were two of the battle ship Maine cases, and they were disposed of on demurrer. In the third year it disposed of 157 cases and only 7 of them were ordinary cases, and the other hundred and fifty were battle ship Maine cases, and they were heard on demurrer and disposed of on a single principle and as a single case. In 1904 the Commission did not dispose of a single case, although it was then three years in existence and fully equipped for its work. In 1905, 49 cases were disposed of, and so far in 1906, 13. That makes a total of 221 cases. But in considering the rate of progress of the Commission it is fair to consider those 152 battle ship claim cases as one case, because they were all disposed of on one principle and upon demurrer. Therefore, if we add that case to the other 69, it really makes 70 cases, or an average rate of 14 cases per year, which is a very small rate indeed.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Will the gentleman permit me to make an observation there to the effect that in the early history of this Commission they had no authority to take testimoney, as I understand it, in Cuba or in Spain.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman is entirely wrong about that.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I think I am right about it. The question arose as to whether or not the Spanish Government had used such force to put down the insurgent rebellion as they were required to use under the rule of international law in order to shift the burden of legal responsibility from their own Government, and in order to understand fully the situation they were obliged to go there and take testimony. And I dissent wholly and completely from the statement that this Commission has not shown both diligence and ability.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman tell me whether any of the Commissioners reside in his own State or in his district?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Yes.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Yes?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I am proud to say they do.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I will go on now and answer the argument of the gentleman.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That does not make any difference, let me say to the gentleman. The gentleman from Michigan who is upon that Commission has plenty to do, is an able lawyer, and his services in his own State are in demand at any time, and his services to the Government are highly creditable.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I will supplement the gan who is upon that Commission has plenty to do, is an able lawyer, but he is in active practice, and he is trying cases at home nearly all the time, and devotes very little of his time to the work of this Commission.

The gentleman has raised a question as to the power of this Commission——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may proceed for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes longer. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want also to say that there is a member of that Commission from my State also, and in order that the gentleman may be fully advised, I will say that I think he comes from the same town I do.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I think that is possibly why he is a member of the Commission. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that while the number of cases decided and disposed of is small in number, apparently, that the principles on which some of these leading cases have been disposed of practically now dispose of a very large majority of those remaining on hand?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman is entirely right in that assertion, and the president of the Commission made the statement, with which the Attorney-General for the defense of claims agreed, that if the Commission adhered to the principles already laid down they would dispose of fully 80 per cent of the remaining cases adversely to the claimants. I think right here I might correct a statement of the gentleman from Iowa, which I am certain he made inadvertently, and that is that these cases were likely to be wound up in one year. As I recall the testimony of the Commissioner the statement was this, that 80 per cent of the remaining cases would be disposed of within the next year. But, although I asked a number of questions, I could get no definite answer to the question as to how long it would take to dispose of the remaining 20 per cent of these cases.

Now, the gentleman from Michigan has said that it was doubtful whether this Commission had power to take testimony abroad. I am aware that that question did arise, but I do not think there was any substantial ground for it. It is true that the Commission required the attorneys who represented these claimants to file briefs with them upon that proposition, and they submitted those briefs to the Senate, and that matter has become a public document. But if you consider that in the organic act the Spanish Treaty Claims Commissioners were given power to appoint commissioners to take testimony, and consider the further fact that the theater of war in which these claims arose was Cuba, you will wonder how there could be a scintilla of doubt that these commissioners must perforce go to Cuba to take the testimony. I think it was a useless quibble, which consumed at least six months, if not more, time of the Commission. The question was finally settled in June of 1902 by the action of Congress itself. There has been no doubt since then about the power to take testimony in Cuba, and therefore from 1902 to 1906 the Commission has not had that as an excuse for its delay.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. They have shown reasonable diligence in view of the importance of their task.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman is mistaken about their having shown reasonable diligence above other commissions. I can point to the action of a good many other commissions where they have proceeded at a much greater rate of speed. I will not take the time of the House to cite them now, but, with the consent of the committee, I would like to put the cases of those other commissions in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to insert matter in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Thus the Mixed Commission on American and British Claims disposed of its whole docket of 478 cases against the United States and 19 against Great Britain—in all, 497 cases—in exactly two years—that is, from September 26, 1871, to September 25, 1873—with no more cost to the United States than $273,672.94. This Commission had to take testimony in almost every State and Territory of the United States, in all the British provinces of North America, in Mexico, in several of the West India islands, in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and in Egypt.

The French and American Claims Commission disposed of its whole docket of 726 cases against the United States and 19 against France—in all, 745 cases—in three years and three months, from December 22, 1880, to March 31, 1884. The total expense to the United States was $325,000.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Is it not a fact that these cases to which you refer, about which you were asked about the Commissioners taking testimony abroad, it required them to be citizens or to take the oath of allegiance to the United States?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I did not hear the gentleman, and therefore do not understand him.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Is it not a fact that the query arose as to the authority to take testimony abroad by reason of the doubt as to authority to appoint anybody but a citizen of the United States or one who had taken an oath of allegiance?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I think you refer to the case of taking testimony in Spain.

Mr. PERKINS. That question could be disposed of without taking six months in hearing the question.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Do you think there would be any difficulty in abolishing the Commission if the other Members would follow the example of the chairman and get into a controversy about legislation? [Laughter.]

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I do not know; but I will state to the gentleman I have found considerable difficulty in getting the Commission abolished.

Mr. MANN. I think if you would get the other two gentlemen on the same line of work you would have no difficulty. [Laughter.]

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I would like to read briefly from the testimony concerning the time put in by this Commission. Although I asked for a statement of the time actually spent by this Commission in their hearings, and that statement was promised to be supplied to us, later the president of the Commission sent a letter to the committee stating that there were no records of the time spent by the Commissioners.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I will ask for about two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Two members of the Commission, without naming them, because I think the gentleman from Michigan is sensitive on that——

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I am not at all sensitive; I am proud of all the Commission. I would like you to name them.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts (continuing). Have law firms at their own homes; they are very able lawyers and very actively engaged in practice at home. The special counsel of this Commission, who gets $5,000 a year, was sent abroad as the counsel on the Alaskan boundary arbitration at London. He received a fee from the United States Government for his services in that connection and at the same time drew his salary as special counsel for the Spanish Commission.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much were the counsel fees on that occasion?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I can not answer that question. That special counsel, by the way, is a lecturer at one of the law schools in Washington and also has a private practice. Another member of the Commission is a lecturer in that law school, and the president of the Commission himself, it is needless for me to say to the House, has been very diligent in attending to every business under the sun except the business for which his office was created.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, while I understand that there is a question of order pending, I am going to assume that it will be sustained by the Chair, and then the question will recur upon the appropriation.

First, I want to go back to the origin of this Commission. Intimately connected with that fact is the suggestion that is now being made to send these cases to the Court of Claims. There was a sharp contest in this House when the Commission was created, and I then took a very earnest position in favor of the Commission, rather than in favor of sending the matter to the Court of Claims. If there is a place on earth that the people of the United States ought to carefully avoid as much as possible, aside from some place that is immoral in its nature, it is the Court of Claims of the United States of America. And in this connection I want to suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN], who is intelligently posted upon everything connected with this matter, that nothing could be more injurious to the best interests of the people of this country than to permit an amendment of the statute that would in the first place send these cases to the Court of Claims, and thereby open the door to the Supreme Court of the United States to adjudicate ultimately the international law involved herein. And by that same token I have opposed always and earnestly oppose now any change in the statute that would give to these claimants the right to go to the Supreme Court of the United States by appeal. The United States never did undertaken any such procedure as that in the Spanish treaty. We simply agreed to audit and pay the claims that arose under the stipulation of the treaty. The statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] is a correct one, that we found ourselves greatly embarrassed by our position as a country. We had taken the position, for instance, that one Doctor Reiss had been murdered in a Spanish prison, and that he was a citizen of the United States, and we asserted our claim against Spain to pay and make good the damage to our citizen. When that case came before the Spanish Claims Commission it turned out that we had no right whatever to interfere, and yet we were practically estopped by our own claim. That is one of the claims that has been allowed and paid, but not nearly so large a sum as was originally claimed by our Government against the Government of Spain.

We therefore undertook to audit and pay those claims. We did not stipulate how it was to be done. At length comes this question, Shall we open an avenue by which these claimants, many of whom are without merit, shall have permission to go to the Supreme Court on appeal, and thereby force our court to make such precedents in regard to adjudications upon questions of international law as in the long future ahead of us will rise up to estop our denial, and the positions that we may take in future controversies of a similar character?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Do we not now send the French spoliation claims to the Court of Claims to report on the law and facts and send the same to Congress, Congress then appropriating the money to pay them? And let me ask the gentleman if the Court of Claims does not by its decisions create precedents in those cases. I should like to ask the gentleman a further question. Does he think that the Supreme Court of the United States would render a decision which was wrong, and therefore make a wrong precedent for the future? And if the Supreme Court decided the question right, should we complain of any precedent created thereby?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask for five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. At the beginning of it, I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he would like to have any more French spoliation claims haunting this Congress and the people of the United States? A relative of mine had one of these claims, the Lord knows how long ago. I voted to pay some of the claims here, and they are coming and going constantly. That was the very ground I took, the reason why I have opposed any more Supreme Court adjudications of these claims that really appeal rather to benevolence than to any legal status.

This Commission therefore has undertaken to decide these cases. I leave the situation as it was described by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], who made a fair statement, so far, at least, as I heard and understood it.

Now, what is to be done? Shall we at once now destroy the efficiency of this Commission, or shall we permit it to go on, with the admonition that certainly it must recognize in the light of the discussions here to-day.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts made the statement just now that some one of the members of this Commission was actively practicing law at home.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Two of them, he says.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have no doubt of that. I am actively engaged in the practice of the law sometimes. Does the gentleman think there is anything objectionable in that?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is to be regretted that Members of Congress have to practice law at home at all; but I was trying to ask the gentleman, Does he himself know that some of these Commissioners are actively practicing law at home?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am not a witness here. The gentleman from Massachusetts says it is a fact.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. It is conceded in the hearings.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will certainly take the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts, if he positively asserts a thing to be a fact. Really, I would take it in preference to my own knowledge.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. He says it is admitted in the record of the hearings.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not think there is any doubt about it.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I do not want the gentleman to think that I am opposed to this appropriation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not; I understand the gentleman's position. Now, speaking about the practice of law at home, these gentlemen live within twelve or fourteen hours' travel to the place in which they practice law at home. Is there any impropriety, under certain circumstances, that these gentlemen should go home and try a special case if they did not neglect the business that brings them here?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It seems that one of the Commissioners lives in Michigan.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is not very far away.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is twelve or fourteen hours.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is a very short distance, and you can do the most of that in a night.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. The gentleman from Ohio was in Congress when the act was passed and the salaries were fixed. Does he think at the time the salaries were fixed at $5,000 each for five men that it was supposed by Congress that that board was to give its entire time to these matters, and not that its members would draw $5,000 a year and practice law besides?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I supposed they would give so much time as was necessary for the efficient discharge of their duties. I say that it is yet to be shown that they have not done that.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman will concede that they have received six years' pay, and that the work is far from done, and that that undoubtedly is a very much longer lapse of time than was thought to be necessary at the time the Commission was established.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, the gentleman is making a speech in my time. I can not understand what he is saying, but I know he is making a speech by his gesticulations. [Laughter.]

Mr. PERKINS. Did the gentleman state to Congress when he advocated the bill that this court would take six years to get through its business?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly I did not; nor did I have the slightest apprehension, no more than the gentleman from New York has now, of the magnitude of the difficulties that this Commission has encountered. Imagine yourself going to the city of Madrid and undertaking to find out who was the captain of a Spanish company located at Post A, in the island of Cuba.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman pardon me? The attorney for the Government didn't even know what company it was that was located there; they had first to find out what company it was and who the captain was.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is true. The best answer to the whole is that the Commission has succeeded in cutting down the claim of $10,000,000 by actual adjudication to something under $1,000,000.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. To $322,000. Let me ask the gentleman from Ohio if he considers that is an admirable thing except upon the assumption that they have dealt justly with the claimants? If the claims were just ones, then cutting down the awards would be an injustice. I do not think they are entitled to credit unless the law and the facts warranted them in cutting down the claims.

Mr. GROSVENOR. They are entitled to this: There stands the affirmative of the claimant and the negative is the Government of the United States. The affirmative is prepared with some evidence to enforce its claim, the Government of the United States is not only without any evidence but primarily without any information.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Following out the gentleman's reasoning, the excellence of the Commission would be still greater if they had allowed nothing at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I will ask for ten minutes more time, and then I will promise to speak no further to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio requests that his time be extended ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts would be valuable if he can show that the Commission has been unjust in its awards to any one of these claimants. I do not believe they have, but they have been beset by more conspiracies and villainy than ever surrounded a Commission in all the annals of time. While I am going to criticise that Commission directly, I do think that in the investigation of these claims, that in the adjudications which they have rendered, they have been eminently conservative, eminently just, and eminently efficient.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman will understand that I am not attempting any criticism of their rules of decision.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think the only criticism that can be made of this Commission is this: I think that under the treaty and the law of their creation every one of these cases, when it was finally adjudicated, ought to have been dismissed permanently and forever within a very brief period of time, just long enough for an able lawyer to prepare a motion for a rehearing or any other procedure that the Commission might see fit to grant in the nature of giving to the claimant every opportunity to have justice done him. Inasmuch as they have permitted the claims to stand there, according to the statement, I think that is a mistake in their administration, and I will tell you where I think the trouble is to come from.

I have had knowledge that there has been a purpose on behalf of these claimants—claimants represented by many of the very best and most distinguished lawyers in the United States—to ultimately secure in some way an avenue to the Supreme Court, and there is a degree of modesty in every judicial tribunal that is worthy of the name not to cut off appeals, not to prevent rehearings; and I have suspected not only that idea in the minds of the Commission, but I have thought it was just barely possible that there might be one or more of the Commission who would be glad to see appeals granted. What would be the result? To give an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in $50,000,000 worth of claims against this Government. Why our great grandchildren down to the remotest generation to come would never hear the end of the Spanish Claims Commission.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Do I understand the gentleman to say that if the claimants could have their cases taken to the Supreme Court that that court would allow $50,000,000 worth of claims?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; I did not say anything like that.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Then, Mr. Chairman, I misunderstood the gentleman. I will say this: I think one effect of it would be that possibly some claims would be remanded to the Commission and the Commission would be obliged to hear them again, and in that manner the life of the Commission would be prolonged still further.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Eternity would be too short to reach the end of those claims.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, much of the discussion here has hinged about appropriating money for getting testimony on the part of the Government. Is it not a fact that the burden of proof is upon the claimants in the first instance?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It certainly ought to be.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Well, what I want to know is this: Is that a rule of this Commission?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me tell the gentleman. I think I will give a little bit of secret history.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And in that connection let me make this further suggestion or ask this further question. Is it the practice of this Commission to require the claimants to take their testimony at the pleasure of the Commission as is the custom in the Court of Claims?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think they limit the time when they shall take their testimony, and there is no question that the ruling is a proper one, that the burden of proof is upon the man who asserts a fact, which is like any other question. I will say to the gentleman now, inasmuch as he has gone to the brink of the question, when that Commission was first organized some of the ablest lawyers in the United States, and others whom I believe have no superior, came before that Commission and for days and days they argued that the Commission was a mere auditing board; that it had nothing to do with the question of whether the injury had transpired or not, and I have been told that two members of the Commission voted to sustain that proposition; that the whole question was a question of auditing, and if a fellow came forward and proved that he come over here and got a naturalization paper that they could not inquire into that, and then when he asserted his claim and made a prima facie showing of it they were bound to pay it and that was the end of it. They resisted vigorously and bitterly any consideration of the question of the fraudulent character of one-half of the naturalizations, and at least two-thirds of the questions of amounts in controversy, and the Commission has waded through all that. The fact that there are intervals when they do not have a case to try and that somebody goes home to try a case there, cuts no figure, in my judgment, in derogation of the efficiency of the Commission.

Now, a few words more and I am through. Why strangle this Commission to death? I am told that the taking of testimony is going constantly forward. I know that the principal Commissioner for that purpose is still at Habana. Whether there are too many clerks, too many stenographers, too many messengers, I do not know. It would be the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to ascertain whether there is any surplus help there, but let us give them an efficient force, and I would not object to a limitation, but it seems to me that there is a limitation in the law that can be readily enforced by the President of the United States. But if we want to abolish that Commission, let us do it by a statute and not do it by strangulation. That is my point. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am through.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Chair rule upon the point of order that I made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had not made it up to this time.

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, I beg the Chair's pardon; I made the point of order at the beginning.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman to reserve it.

Mr. PERKINS. I did not so intend it. At any rate, I make the point of order now.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the regular order. In lines 14, 15, 16, and 17, this language occurs:

So much of the provisions of the act of March 2, 1901, providing for the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission as are in conflict herewith notwithstanding.

In the opinion of the Chair that modifies the statute and is, therefore, legislation. The point of order, therefore, is sustained.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as a new paragraph at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment in the form of a new paragraph, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Defense of suits before Spanish Treaty Claims Commission: For salaries and expenses in defense of claims before the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission, including salaries of assistant attorney-general in charge as fixed by law, and of assistant attorneys and necessary employees in Washington, D. C., or elsewhere, $92,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order to that.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I submit that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. PERKINS. Where is the statutory authority for it?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is found in the act creating the Commission.

Mr. PERKINS. Cite your authority.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman make a point of order?

Mr. PERKINS. I did; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. On what ground?

Mr. PERKINS. On the ground that I am not aware of any statutory authority. The act, as I remember it, authorizes the creation of the court, authorizes the payment of the salaries of the members of the court and other officers, but it does not authorize the appropriation of any unlimited sum of money for expenses before the court. The court might have no business. The court might have gone out of existence. The authority to continue to make appropriations for expenses for proceedings in the court does not result from the fact that the court itself may still continue in existence.

Mr. TAWNEY. May I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order on the ground that there is no statutory authority, and then he calls upon the committee to cite the authority. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the presumption is in favor of there being authority for the act, and the gentleman who makes the point of order has the burden of proof that there is no statutory authority.

Mr. PERKINS. I think, Mr. Chairman, that I might reply, in view of the decisions made by the Chairman on this bill, that there is certainly no presumption of statutory authority in favor of a provision contained in this appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman making the proposition should show affirmatively that there is authority of law.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The act creating this Commission provided for the litigation of these claims before the Commission. It seems to me that having created the Department of Justice——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman cite that act and send it up here, if he has it?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. It is the act of March 2, 1901.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This act created this judicial tribunal. It made it indispensable that the claims filed before the Commission should be defended. The law creates the Department of Justice, charged with the defense of claims against the United States, and under the authority creating the Department of Justice charged with the defense of claims and the law creating this Commission to adjudicate these claims, I insist there is authority of law for the payment of indispensable aids in the defense.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. How many years has this Commission been at work now?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. About five years.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask him if he does not think it would be wise to transfer this entire business to the Court of Claims and quit this thing?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. In this case the question was fully discussed. I have answered that quite fully. It would be a calamity, in my judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the specific point of order made against this by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. I would say, Mr. Chairman, that the act creating the Commission in the first place creates the Commission and authorizes their pay. Of course, no point of order could be raised to that until the Commission had been abolished. But that is no portion of the $92,000. It then authorizes the Commission to appoint certain clerks. They are not provided for by this section. It says:

The President shall appoint one assistant attorney-general, who shall hold his office * * * It shall be the duty of the assistant attorney-general and assistant attorneys to appear as attorneys and counsel for the United States and defend the United States in all proceedings before the commission.

Now, the provision offered by the gentleman from Iowa provides generally for salaries and expenses in defense of claims, including the salary of the assistant attorney-general, all to be selected, and their compensation fixed, by the Attorney-General, $92,000.

I say, in the first place, there is no provision in the law that I find that authorizes the Attorney-General to fix these salaries. The only provision there is authorizes the President to appoint one assistant attorney-general, who, with other officers, presumably officers of the United States, not new offices to be created, but officers who shall attend to this business in connection with the other business imposed upon them, shall attend to the defense of suits. It needs no argument that where duties are imposed upon the Attorney-General's Office, that does not of itself authorize the creation of a new officer to be paid fees to be fixed by the Attorney-General himself.

Doubtless the officers of the Attorney-General's Office are not appointed under this statute. Their salaries are provided in regular appropriation bills for the Attorney-General's Office. That does not give any authority to make an appropriation of $90,000 for salaries of this kind. If they could appropriate $92,000, they could appropriate $192,000. If such discretion were given, they could create in this way, not by regular appropriation bills, not by the creation of an office, not by fixing their salaries, but by a gross appropriation for the expense of defense, any number of United States officials, at salaries to be fixed, not by this body, but by the Attorney-General.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York whether there is not authority in the Paris treaty of peace for this legislation? Certainly that is the organic law and furnishes ample warrant for this appropriation, if the act creating the Commission does not.

Mr. PERKINS. The treaty does not impose any responsibility to pay appropriations.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. It puts all the responsibility on the Government and necessitates the appropriation of money to give it effect.

Mr. PERKINS. It might impose a governmental responsibility, but it does not give the right to appropriate money or create United States officers and fix their salaries.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. It makes necessary the employment of such force as is required to give effect to its provisions and execute its terms; it is law; its function fully appears both in the treaty and in the act creating the Commission.

Mr. PERKINS. I must say I differ with the gentleman on that.

Mr. MANN. Could the treaty fix that?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa follows with sufficient exactness the language of the statute. The Chair understands the point of order to be made because there is an attempt to appropriate by this section for some officers and employees that have not been created by the organic act.

Mr. PERKINS. The point of order is that it allows payment of salaries that are not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understood.

Mr. PERKINS. This is the ordinary point of order made against appropriation bills.

The CHAIRMAN. Referring to the act that created the Spanish Board of Claims, this language will be found:

"All expenses, including salary and compensation of said Commission and of its officers and employees," showing that it would clearly contemplate officers provided for in the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa and necessary employees. From the language of the statute, the Chair is inclined to the opinion that the point of order is not well taken, and therefore overrules it.

Mr. SIMS. I offer this as a substitute to that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers a substitute as an amendment to the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for the pending amendment the words "That the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission is hereby abolished."

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that substitute, that it changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, on the ground that it is legislation and not germane.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to just a few lines in the hearings in support of this amendment:

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Fuller, the claims filed before the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission aggregated $60,000,000.
Mr. FULLER. $61,652,077.78.
Mr. SMITH. There were 542 in number, of which 221 have been finally disposed of.
Mr. FULLER. I believe that is the number. Possibly two or three more than that since that report was made.
Mr. SMITH. How much did the 221 cases involve?
Mr. FULLER. $10,764,647.51.
Mr. SMITH. Of the 321 cases undisposed of, how many are practically covered by the decisions already rendered so as to be disposed of, in all probability, unless an appeal is allowed?
Mr. FULLER. Well, simply an estimate that I would make would be 80 per cent.
Mr. SMITH. But what would you say as to the amount involved in cases that are covered by the decision already rendered and that are simply being held on the docket awaiting determination as to whether an appeal should be allowed or not?
Mr. FULLER. I don't believe I quite catch that question.
Mr. SMITH. How much is involved in this 80 per cent covered by the effect of decisions already rendered?
Mr. FULLER. I should estimate $40,000,000.

In other words, it appears from the hearings about two-fifths of the cases in number have been disposed of, and 80 per cent of the remaining three-fifths are covered by the principles announciated in the cases already decided; so that I was more than correct when I stated that nine-tenths of the cases had been, in effect, disposed of, because a great deal more than nine-tenths have been, in effect, disposed of.

Now, I have listened to charges made against these Commissioners, but with that I have nothing to do and this appropriation has nothing to do; still I do think it only fair to these Commissioners to say that the evidence shows that they have always been ready to hear the cases whenever the Government counsel and the attorneys for the complainants or claimants were ready for trial.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I agree with the gentleman in that, but does he think that they were always ready to compel the claimants to try their cases, to press their cases as expeditiously as they should?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think the cases have been pressed just as expeditiously as the counsel for the Government could press them under the peculiar circumstances of this litigation.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Do you not think that the Commission should have ordered the Assistant Attorney-General to move to dismiss many cases for lack of prosecution?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. There have been no cases that have not been diligently prosecuted, except in this sense: The cases of certain claimants were subject to dismissal under the precedents established by the court. An application was made to Congress for the right of appeal, and the Commission has indulged these claimants until after the end of this session of Congress, to see whether Congress gives them the right of appeal from the announcement made by the Commission.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Massachusetts has stated that there are certain of these Commissioners who practice law regularly at home. I want to know who they are? He says the record states that.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman from Massachusetts had better state that. It is true that some of the Commissioners practice law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Not Senator Chandler, I dare say.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. There are some of the Commissioners who practice law, but they have always been here to try every case that was ready for trial. There has never been a delay of an hour because of the absence of any Commissioner, so that the inference of the gentleman is without any point.

Mr. HINSHAW. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. HINSHAW. What is your estimate of the entire expense of this Commission during the five years of its life?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, I can not give you accurate figures; something like six or seven hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HINSHAW. What has been the amount of judgments rendered by this Commission which the United States will be obliged to pay?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. About $300,000.

Mr. HINSHAW. So that about $1,000,000 is the aggregate expense of the Commission and its judgments, as against $60,000,000 of claims that were filed?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is correct.

Mr. HINSHAW. Does the gentleman not consider, therefore, that from a business point of view the Commission has been a remunerative one for the Government of the United States, by reason of the money that it has saved in claims which the United States might otherwise have been compelled to pay?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think so, in every sense.

Mr. SIMS. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. I offered my substitute, not through any fault that I have to find with the Commission, but it seems that the parties for whom it has been created are not taking advantage of it and that they are not pressing their claims, and I do not see any use in continuing a Commission that they do not take advantage of.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman is in error about that. Every case that can be filed before this Commission has been filed and is being prosecuted now.

Mr. TAWNEY. I move that all debate on the pending paragraph be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD an extract from the committee hearings on the question of absentee Commissioners.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to print certain statements in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. SULLIVAN. Are members of your Commission engaged in the private practice of law?
Mr. CHANDLER. Yes; Mr. Diekema and Mr. Wood have law firms at their home residences. Mr. Maury has law cases once in a while.
Mr. SULLIVAN. Have you any record of absenteeism of members of the Commission?
Mr. CHANDLER. I should not use that word "absenteeism." I should not consider it as applying. If you mean how much they have been here and how much at home, there is no record. All meetings of the Commission must be held here, and the construction never has been given by us to the law as requiring our constant attendance in Washington.
Mr. SULLIVAN. The law does not say so, and I did not think anyone ever construed it so—that they should give all of their time.
Mr. CHANDLER. No; we have not done that. I have not practiced law myself, although I have given a great deal of gratuitous advice on private or public questions to my friends. Mr. Fuller and his force have given continuous service, and have done no other law business, except that Mr. Hannis Taylor, who is the special counsel, and was formerly our minister to Spain, possibly has a law case once in a while. I know he is engaged in the case of Louisiana against Mississippi in the Supreme Court, and he went to London in the Alaska boundary case.
Mr. TAYLOR. He has no private law office?
Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir; and he is not, strictly speaking, an appointee of the Government. He is special counsel, employed on account of his ability, to assist Mr. Fuller.
Mr. TAYLOR. He has no existing firm?
Mr. CHANDLER. He has no existing firm. He goes to the Assistant Attorney-General's office every day, and practically gives his whole time to the business.
Mr. SULLIVAN. His salary as special counsel to the Commission went on while he was at London on the Alaska boundary case?
Mr. CHANDLER. Not salary; his monthly pay. He received $416 a month, and the State Department made him a further allowance of, I think, two or three thousand dollars.
Mr. SULLIVAN. Does he lecture at the George Washington University law school?
Mr. CHANDLER. Indeed he does, and so does Mr. Maury.
Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Chambers does not have any lecture engagements or private practice?
Mr. CHANDLER. No; Mr. Chambers's home is in Sheffield, Ala. Except in giving legal advice once in a while he has comparatively no private practice.
Mr. SULLIVAN. But Mr. Maury and yourself are the two members of the Commission who devote practically all their time to the affairs of the Commission?
Mr. CHANDLER. I do not devote all my time to it; I do lots of other things.
Mr. SULLIVAN. Such as you have enumerated here?
Mr. CHANDLER. Such as I have told you.
Mr. SULLIVAN. Can you tell me how much time out of each year Commissioner Diekema and Commissioner Wood devote to private practice?
Mr. CHANDLER. I would not undertake to say. I will give you the best idea I can. When their law firms have a case to be tried they help try the case, but so far as I judge they do very little office work or routine work at home.
Mr. SULLIVAN. They are rather active trial lawyers, are they not?
Mr. CHANDLER. They are the ablest trial lawyers in the United States—among the ablest.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending paragraph is exhausted. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. SIMS and Mr. PERKINS) there were—ayes 105, noes 21.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do that to ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a letter from Jane Addams in reference to the immigration bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the letter to which he refers. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

HULL HOUSE, Chicago, June 11, 1906.

Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
Speaker of House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Many of us in Chicago are much disturbed over the immigration legislation at present before Congress, and we venture to send to you some of the reasons for our concern.

The recent action of the Senate and the imminence of similar action in the House has taken by surprise many of those most interested in this extremely important question. The present proposals seem to us narrow and unwisely restrictive in some points and, on the other hand, to omit desirable regulation of immigration, such, for instance, as might be secured by a closer control of steerage conditions, as recommended by the immigration conference held in New York last December. The regulation of immigration affects not only the industry, racial composition, and future culture of America, but it immediately determines the fate of hundreds of helpless and inarticulate persons desiring to join their families and friends in this country and hundreds of others who come here to seek freedom or rather a bare security of life and property and an opportunity for their children. These people are intimately related by ties of kindred and friendship to the entire country, and we will, we believe, never be satisfied with the regulation of this great matter, which has taken on such unexpected proportions and changed so greatly in character during the past decade, until it is made the subject of careful, impartial, and full inquiry, apart from the pressure of political debate and party motives. Because a similar bill passed the Senate after only a few hours' debate, we venture to urge upon your attention as a substitute some such legislation as was proposed in Mr. BARTHOLDT'S resolution (H. J. Res. 161) establishing a joint commission of inquiry into the subject of immigration, providing, however, for a widening of the scope of the committee to include persons outside the Legislature, but fitted by experience or knowledge to be of special value as coworkers on such a commission. To state briefly our objections to some of the provisions embodied in H. R. 17941:

(1) Sec. 1, H. R. 17941.—The increased head tax is repugnant to us unless it can be proved that this is a sine qua non for defraying the expenses of bureaus of information planned to enable the immigrants to distribute themselves better. The proviso whereby the income of the proposed head tax in excess of a certain sum should be diverted from the immigrant fund altogether is especially objectionable. It seems unworthy of our country to mulct immigrants in sums so petty yet so important to themselves and to thereby distinctly lessen their chance of success in their adopted country.

(2) Sec. 2.—In regard to exclusion on specified physical and medical grounds, we object to the present bill both for some of its new provisions and because it does not amend the present law in certain respects in which we feel that it needs modification. While a general restrictive provision as regards persons likely to be physically dangerous or financially burdensome is obviously justifiable, it should be accompanied, in our opinion, by discretionary power to admit in special cases.

For instance, the proposed legislation excluding persons who have been insane seems to us preposterous, standing, as it does, without qualification. It is easy to see how cases might arise in which this provision would separate families and exclude persons financially independent, physically sound, and entirely desirable as citizens. Persons are sometimes insane temporarily as a result of childbirth, a simple tumor, or of other passing causes which do not affect their future health or that of their descendants.

In regard to the feeble-minded and imbecile we have to do with a permanent condition, but here, too, there should be discretion. Take the case of a father established in America with the elder children, while the wife and the younger ones are to follow later. Meanwhile the baby has scarlet fever and is left with arrested brain development. The wife must desert either her husband and elder boys and girls or the helpless child. A friend of mine in a similar case saw a poor woman from Russia before the court of special inquiry swoon away and drop to the ground when she learned that her little child was debarred as an idiot. She was herself in a condition which precluded her going back with her baby. He had to be taken away from her and sent home with an elder sister.

As the law now stands there is no power on earth that can alter this result. In regard to all the persons debarred on medical grounds the word of the medical inspector is final. If he finds himself obliged to report idiocy, insanity, or a previous attack of insanity within five years, there is no appeal and no alternative to deportation. Neither the Secretary of Commerce and Labor nor the President of the United States nor any other person can interfere.

The proposed law adds to this list of cases, in which there is no appeal, all cases previously insane, the feeble-minded and imbecile, the tuberculous, and persons certified to be of a low vitality or poor physique, such as would incapacitate them for self-support. My contention is that not only does the law, as it now stands, imperatively need modification, lodging somewhere the power to make exceptions to hard and fast rules in suitable cases, but that this fault in the direction of lack of elasticity is made far more dangerous by the inclusion of the proposed new categories. It is clear that to frame such provisos is a matter requiring careful deliberation and consultation with officials charged with administering the law who best understand the kind of cases in which our laws work unnecessary hardship.

In regard to the exclusion of boys and girls under 16 coming without their parents, this is liable to work very badly. Suppose a man in America whose wife dies abroad and who asks his sister to bring his children to him. I have personally known many such cases. In regard to other points involved in this section, such as modification of the law as to contract labor and assisted immigration, there are undoubtedly also points which deserve further consideration.

(3) Section 3.—In this section dealing with the importation of women for immoral purposes we note with surprise that the present provisions appear to be weakened by adding the qualifying terms "alien" woman, "knowingly" hold, and by striking out the minimum limit of the term of imprisonment, leaving a maximum limit only. It seems to us unfortunate, to say the least, that in a law the general tendency of which is in the direction of greater stringency there should be a relaxation on this point.

(4) Section 12, requiring lists of passengers leaving the country, is one we heartily desire to see carried out.

(5) Section 20.—The effect of extending the time during which deportation is permissible from two years to three is one on which the representatives of public and private charitable boards should be consulted at length. It is an important point. It might be wise to consider part of the immigrant fund (if necessary, receipts from an increased tax) as an insurance for the expenses of return in case of necessity, and to allow deportation at the expense of this fund at any time to any person with the proviso that such deportation should bar reentry unless the expenses of such deportation were reimbursed. This would lessen our difficulties in times of depression, carrying home part of the unemployed, and would solve the difficulties of many stranded and unhappy persons who have proved misfits in this country, to the unspeakable benefit of themselves and the community. New York has long followed such a policy as a State, and with excellent results.

(6) Section 36.—It is to be considered whether the provisions of section 36 could not advantageously be somewhat extended.

(7) Section 38.—The illiteracy test does not seem to us a reasonable or a desirable one, but we have to admit that this subject has been largely discussed, and will not here submit any further arguments. We do believe, however, that there are valid reasons against regarding it as a fair or useful test, which a commission such as is urged in this letter should and would consider.

(8) Section 39.—In regard to the requirement of a fixed sum of money as a requisite for admission, we feel strongly opposed. Such a requirement is a two-edged weapon. In practice it would be very likely to take the place of a more particular inquiry as to the likelihood of self-support, which it by no means guarantees. It would also tend to give the impression to those proposing to immigrate that $50 for a family or $25 for an individual was a sufficient sum in hand with which to enter the United States, and so mislead them—to their cost and ours. On the other hand, it would exclude persons perfectly competent to support themselves and entirely desirable immigrants. For instance, immigrants entering at Galveston, so-called "home-seekers," without address or acquaintance and with practically no money, find at present instant employment with transportation to the place of work, and the scene on the Galveston wharf is one where railroad agents are making offers of employment which the immigrants are weighing and comparing while holding out for better terms. Under such circumstances $25 in hand is not a matter of importance to the immigrants or to us. In New York the situation is very different.

This brings up a third point with regard to this matter. We should hope to see such a commission as is desired consider the advisability of legislation framed to direct immigrants to the districts where they are needed. For instance, it might seem wise to require a given sum in hand of immigrants who are not paying their transportation to such States as offer a field for immigrants. Thus an immigrant might, under proper circumstances, be allowed to land without that sum in Texas, or in New York if he had a ticket through, let us say, to Colorado; while he would not be admitted in New York or Boston unless he had either the required amount or a ticket west or south. This is a rough suggestion, but some such device might be employed to help divert the current from the congested centers.

(9) Further provisions which we should hope to see such a commission consider would be stringent requirements as to conditions on shipboard, making steerage accommodations virtually as good as the present second class. This would be desirable on many accounts.

We should also hope that such a commission would consider the advisability of having a United States inspector and a United States matron on board all immigrant ships to look after the conditions of comfort, health, and morals afforded the passengers, to learn to know their character, and to give them information such as the contemplated bureaus of information would also furnish.

Another proposal which might be discussed is to have a staff for medical examination only at the ports of embarkation, this examination to take the place of that on arriving in the United States and to be final, except in cases of appeal.

This letter has run to an unexpected length, but it seemed necessary to adduce all the points mentioned to show what seem to us valid reasons for urging the inadvisability of the bill in its present shape, and of this or of any other legislation until after a far more complete and modern inquiry into the whole matter than has yet been made.

Feeling sure that you will accept our interest in this matter as an explanation of this letter, I am,

Faithfully, yours, JANE ADDAMS.

The Clerk read as follows:

Enforcement of antitrust laws: That the balance of the appropriation of $500,000 for the enforcement of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, and other acts mentioned in said appropriation, made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1904, approved February 25, 1903, shall continue available during the fiscal year 1907.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the gentleman from Minnesota, chairman of the committee, a question. Did not the gentleman make an agreement with Mr. WILLIAMS last night that the committee would rise at 5 o'clock?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I said I would try to have the committee rise, and I am going to in about five minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why does not the gentleman try now?

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to have read the paragraph following and then we will rise, because, as I understand, they want to call up the conference report on the statehood bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise. First, however, I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair has recognized the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that my amendment will be considered as pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's amendment will be considered as pending.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that when the subdivision pertaining to the isthmian canal is reached I may have leave to address the House for one hour on the subject of the type of canal to be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that when the item in reference to the isthmian canal is reached he may have one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not object to that, but I think if some other gentleman wants to advocate another type of canal, he ought to be given an hour in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, did I understand the Chair to state that an amendment to the section read would be in order to-morrow?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so.

The motion of Mr. TAWNEY, that the committee rise, was then agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WATSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the sundry civil appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 12707) known as the "statehood bill."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan calls up the bill of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to waive the reading of the report and the statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 37 and 38.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, and 39, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16, inclusive, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amended section insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That all male persons over the age of twenty-one years who are citizens of the United States, or who are members of any Indian nation or tribe in said Indian Territory and Oklahoma, and who have resided within the limits of said proposed State for at least six months next preceding the election, are hereby authorized to vote for and choose delegates to form a constitutional convention for said proposed State, and all persons qualified to vote for said delegates shall be eligible to serve as delegates; and the delegates to form such convention shall be one hundred and eleven in number, fifty-five of whom shall be elected by the people of the Territory of Oklahoma and fifty-five by the people of Indian Territory, and one shall be elected by the electors residing in the Osage Indian Reservation in the Territory of Oklahoma; and the governor, the chief justice, and the secretary of the Territory of Oklahoma shall apportion the Territory of Oklahoma into fifty-five districts, as nearly equal in population as may be, which apportionment shall not include the Osage Indian Reservation, but said Osage Indian Reservation shall constitute one election district, and the governor, the chief justice, and the secretary of the Territory of Oklahoma shall appoint an election commissioner who shall establish voting precincts in said Osage Indian Reservation, and shall appoint the judges for election in said Osage Reservation; and the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes, and two judges of the United States courts for the Indian Territory, to be designated by the President, shall constitute a board, which shall apportion the said Indian Territory into fifty-five districts, as nearly equal in population as may be, and one delegate shall be elected from each of said districts; and the governor of said Oklahoma Territory, together with the judge senior in service of the United States courts in Indian Territory, shall, by proclamation in which such apportionment shall be fully specified and announced, order an election of the delegates aforesaid in said proposed State at a time designated by them within six months after the approval of this act, which proclamation shall be issued at least sixty days prior to the time of holding said election of delegates. The election for delegates in the Territory of Oklahoma and in said Indian Territory shall be conducted, the returns made, the result ascertained, and the certificates of all persons elected to such convention issued in the same manner as is prescribed by the laws of the Territory of Oklahoma regulating elections for Delegates to Congress. That the election laws of the Territory of Oklahoma now in force, as far as applicable and not in conflict with this act, including the penal laws of said Territory of Oklahoma relating to elections and illegal voting, are hereby extended to and put in force in said Indian Territory until the legislature of said proposed State shall otherwise provide, and until all persons offending against said laws in the election aforesaid shall have been dealt with in the manner therein provided. And the United States courts of said Indian Territory shall have the same power to enforce the laws of the Territory of Oklahoma, hereby extended to and put in force in said Territory, as have the courts of the Territory of Oklahoma: Provided, however, That said board to apportion districts in Indian Territory shall, for the purpose of said election, appoint an election commissioner for each district who shall distribute all ballots and election supplies to the several precincts in his district, receive the election returns from the judges in precincts, and deliver the same to the canvassing board therein named, establish and define the necessary election precincts, and appoint three judges of election for each precinct, not more than two of whom shall be of the same political party, which judges may appoint the necessary clerk or clerks; that said judges of election, so appointed, shall supervise the election in their respective precincts, and canvass and make due return of the vote cast, to the election commissioner for said district, who shall deliver said returns, poll books, and ballots to said board, which shall constitute the ultimate and final canvassing board of said election, and they shall issue certificates of election to all persons elected to such convention from the various districts of the Indian Territory, and their certificates of election shall be prima facie evidence as to the election of delegates: Provided further, That in said Indian Territory and Osage Indian Reservation nominations for delegate to said constitutional convention may be made by convention by the Republican, Democratic, and People's Party, or by petition in the manner provided by the laws of the Territory of Oklahoma; and certificates and petitions of nomination in said Indian Territory shall be filed with the districting and canvassing board, who shall perform the duties of election commissioner under said laws, and shall prepare, print, and distribute all ballots, poll books, and election supplies necessary for the holding of said election under said laws. The capital of said State shall temporarily be at the city of Guthrie, in the present Territory of Oklahoma, and shall not be changed therefrom previous to anno Domini nineteen hundred and thirteen, but said capital shall, after said year, be located by the electors of said State at an election to be provided for by the legislature: Provided, however, That the legislature of said State, except as shall be necessary for the convenient transaction of the public business of said State at said capital, shall not appropriate any public moneys of the State for the erection of buildings for capitol purposes during such period."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 17: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "or in which the United States maintained laws prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquors." And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert:

"Where any part of the lands granted by this act to the State of Oklahoma are valuable for minerals, which term shall also include gas and oil, such lands shall not be sold by the said State prior to January first, nineteen hundred and fifteen; but the same may be leased for periods not exceeding five years by the State officers duly authorized for that purpose, such leasing to be made by public competition after not less than thirty days' advertisement in the manner to be prescribed by law, and all such leasing shall be done under sealed bids and awarded to the highest responsible bidder. The leasing shall require and the advertisement shall specify in each case a fixed royalty to be paid by the successful bidder, in addition to any bonus offered for the lease, and all proceeds from leases shall be covered into the fund to which they shall properly belong, and no transfer or assignment of any lease shall be valid or confer any right in the assignee without the consent of the proper State authorities in writing: Provided, however, That agricultural lessees in possession of such lands shall be reimbursed by the mining lessees for all damage done to said agricultural lessees' interest therein by reason of such mining operations. The legislature of the State may prescribe additional legislation governing such leases not in conflict herewith."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 40: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following:

The aforesaid convention shall consist of one hundred and ten delegates, sixty-six of which delegates shall be elected to said convention by the people of the Territory of New Mexico and forty-four by the people of the Territory of Arizona; and the governors, chief justices, and secretaries of each of said Territories, respectively, shall apportion the delegates to be thus elected from their respective Territories, as nearly as may be, equitably among the several counties thereof in accordance with the population as shown by the Federal census of nineteen hundred; and such governors, respectively, shall, within twenty days after the approval of this act by the President of the United States, by proclamation, in which such apportionment shall be fully specified and announced, order an election of the delegates aforesaid in their respective Territories, to be held on the fifth Tuesday after the approval of this act as aforesaid; and the proper officials, as now provided by law in each of said Territories, respectively, shall immediately upon the approval of this act make, or cause to be made, as the case may be, in time for the election, a supplemental or general registration, as may be necessary, of the male citizens of the United States over the age of twenty-one years who shall have resided in said Territories, respectively, for six months, in the county for ninety days, and in the precinct, ward, or election district where they are to vote thirty days next preceding the date fixed for said election, whose names shall be placed upon or added to the great registers, or registration lists, as the case may be, exhibiting the names of the qualified voters of said Territories, respectively. And the persons so qualified shall be entitled to be so registered and to vote for delegates to the constitutional convention. Persons possessing the qualifications entitling them to vote for delegates to the constitutional convention under this act shall be entitled to vote on the ratification or rejection of the constitution submitted to the people of said Territories hereunder, and on the election of all officials whose election is taking place at the same time, under such rules or regulations as said convention may prescribe, not in conflict with this act: Provided, That said registration lists shall answer for both or all such elections.

"SEC. 25. That the delegates to the convention thus elected shall meet in the hall of the house of representatives of the Territory of New Mexico, in the city of Santa Fe therein, on the second Monday after their election, but they shall not receive compensation for more than thirty days of service, and after organization shall declare on behalf of the people of said proposed State that they adopt the Constitution of the United States, whereupon the said convention shall be, and is hereby, authorized to form a constitution and State government for said proposed State. The constitution shall be republican in form, and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except as to Indians not taxed, and shall not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence. And said convention shall provide, by ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State—

"Second. That the people inhabiting said proposed State do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated and ungranted public lands lying within the boundaries thereof and to all lands lying within said limits owned or held by any Indian or Indian tribes, except as hereinafter provided, and that until the title thereto shall have been extinguished by the United States the same shall be and remain subject to the disposition of the United States, and such Indian lands shall remain under the absolute jurisdiction and control of the Congress of the United States; that the lands and other property belonging to citizens of the United States residing without the said State shall never be taxed at a higher rate than the lands and other property belonging to residents thereof; that no taxes shall be imposed by the State on lands or property therein belonging to or which may hereafter be purchased by the United States or reserved for its use; but nothing herein, or in the ordinance herein provided for, shall preclude the said State from taxing, as other lands and other property are taxed, any lands and other property owned or held by any Indian who has severed his tribal relations and has obtained from the United States or from any person a title thereto by patent or other grant, save and except such lands as have been or may be granted to any Indian or Indians under any act of Congress containing a provision exempting the lands thus granted from taxation, but said ordinance shall provide that all such lands shall be exempt from taxation by said State so long and to such extent as such act of Congress may prescribe.

"Third. That the debts and liabilities of said Territory of Arizona and of said Territory of New Mexico shall be assumed and paid by said State, and that said State shall be subrogated to all the rights of indemnity and reimbursement which either of said Territories now has.

"Fourth. That provision shall be made for the establishment and maintenance of a system of public schools, which shall be open to all the children of said State and free from sectarian control; and that said schools shall always be conducted in English: Provided, That nothing in this act shall preclude the teaching of other languages in said public schools.

"Fifth. That said State shall never enact any law restricting or abridging the right of suffrage on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and that ability to read, write, and speak the English language sufficiently well to conduct the duties of the office without the aid of an interpreter shall be a necessary qualification for all State officers.

"Sixth. That the capital of said State shall temporarily be at the city of Santa Fe, in the present Territory of New Mexico, and shall not be changed therefrom previous to anno Domini nineteen hundred and fifteen, but the permanent location of said capital may, after said year, be fixed by the electors of said State, voting at an election to be provided for by the legislature.

"SEC. 26. That in case a constitution and State government shall be formed in compliance with the provisions of this act, the convention forming the same shall provide by ordinance for submitting said constitution to the people of said proposed State for its ratification or rejection, at an election to be held on the sixth day of November, nineteen hundred and six, at which election the qualified voters of said proposed State shall vote directly for or against the proposed constitution and for or against any provisions thereof separately submitted. The returns of said election shall be made by the election officers direct to the secretary of the Territory of New Mexico at Santa Fe; who, with the governors and chief justices of said Territories, or any four of them, shall meet at said city of Santa Fe on the third Monday after said election and shall canvass the same; and if a majority of the legal votes cast on that question in each of said Territories shall be for the constitution the said canvassing board shall certify the result to the President of the United States, together with the statement of the votes cast thereon, and upon separate articles or propositions, and a copy of said constitution, articles, propositions, and ordinances. And if the constitution and government of said proposed State are republican in form, and if the provisions in this act have been complied with in the formation thereof, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, within twenty days from the receipt of the certificate of the result of said election and the statement of the votes cast thereon and a copy of said constitution, articles, propositions, and ordinances from said board, to issue his proclamation announcing the result of said election, and thereupon the proposed State shall be deemed admitted by Congress into the Union, under and by virtue of this act, under the name of Arizona, on an equal footing with the original States, from and after the date of said proclamation.

"The original of said constitution, articles, propositions, and ordinances, and the election returns, and a copy of the statement of the votes cast at said election shall be forwarded and turned over by the secretary of the Territory of New Mexico to the State authorities.

"SEC. 27. That until the next general census, or until otherwise provided by law, said State shall be entitled to two Representatives in the House of Representatives of the United States, which Representatives, together with the governor and other officers provided for in said constitution, and also all other State and county officers, shall be elected on the same day of the election for the adoption of the constitution; and until said State officers are elected and qualified under the provisions of the constitution, and the State is admitted into the Union, the Territorial officers of said Territories, respectively, including Delegates to Congress, shall continue to discharge the duties of their respective offices in said Territories until their successors are duly elected and qualified.

"SEC. 28. That upon the admission of said State into the Union there is hereby granted unto it, including the sections thereof heretofore granted, four sections of public land in each township in the proposed State for the support of free public nonsectarian common schools, to wit: Sections numbered thirteen, sixteen, thirty-three, and thirty-six, and where such sections or any parts thereof have been sold or otherwise disposed of by or under the authority of any act of Congress other lands equivalent thereto, in legal subdivisions of not less than one quarter section and as contiguous as may be to the section in lieu of which the same is taken; such indemnity lands to be selected within said respective portions of said State in the manner provided in this act: Provided, That the thirteenth, sixteenth, thirty-third, and thirty-sixth sections embraced in permanent reservations for national purposes shall not at any time be subject to the grants nor to the indemnity provisions of this act, but other lands equivalent thereto may be selected for such school purposes in lieu thereof; nor shall any lands embraced in Indian, military, or other reservations of any character be subject to the grants of this act, but such reservation lands shall be subject to the indemnity provisions of this act: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall repeal or affect any act of Congress relating to the Casa Grande Ruin as now defined or as may be hereafter defined or extended, or the power of the United States over it, or any other lands embraced in the State hereafter set aside by Congress as a national park, game preserve, or for the preservation of objects of archæological or ethnological interest; and nothing contained in this act shall interfere with the rights and ownership of the United States in any land hereafter set aside by Congress as national park, game preserve, or other reservation, or in the said Casa Grande Ruin as it now is or may be hereafter defined or extended by law, but exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, shall be exercised by the United States, which shall have exclusive control and jurisdiction over the same; but nothing in this proviso contained shall be construed to prevent the service within said Casa Grande Ruin, or national parks, game preserves, and other reservations hereafter established by law, of civil and criminal processes lawfully issued by the authority of said State; and said lands shall not be subject at any time to the school grants of this act that may be embraced within the metes and bounds of the national park, game preserve, and other reservation, or the said Casa Grande Ruin, as now defined or may be hereafter defined; but other lands equivalent thereto may be selected for such school purposes hereinbefore provided in lieu thereof.

"SEC. 29. That three hundred sections of the unappropriated nonmineral public lands within said State, to be selected and located in legal subdivisions, as provided in this act, are hereby granted to said State for the purpose of erecting legislative, executive, and judicial public buildings in the same, and for the payment of the bonds heretofore or hereafter issued therefor.

"SEC. 30. That the lands granted to the Territory of Arizona by the act of February eighteenth, eighteen hundred and eighty-one, entitled 'An act to grant lands to Dakota, Montana, Arizona, Idaho, and Wyoming for university purposes,' are hereby vested in the proposed State to the extent of the full quantity of seventy-five sections, and any portion of said lands that may not have been selected by said Territory of Arizona may be selected by the said State. In addition to the foregoing, and in addition to all lands heretofore granted for such purpose, there shall be, and hereby is, granted to said State, to take effect when the same is admitted to the Union, three hundred sections of land, to be selected from the public domain within said State in the same manner as provided in this act, and the proceeds of all such lands shall constitute a permanent fund, to be safely invested and held by said State, and the income thereof be used exclusively for university purposes. The schools, colleges, and universities provided for in this act shall forever remain under the exclusive control of the said State, and no part of the proceeds arising from the sale or disposal of any lands herein granted for educational purposes shall be used for the support of any sectarian or denominational school, college, or university.

"SEC. 31. That nothing in this act shall be so construed, except where the same is so specifically stated, as to repeal any grant of land heretofore made by any act of Congress to either of said Territories, but such grants are hereby ratified and confirmed in and to said State, and all of the land that may not, at the time of the admission of said State into the Union, have been selected and segregated from the public domain, may be so selected and segregated in the manner provided in this act.

"SEC. 32. That five per centum of the proceeds of the sales of public lands lying within said State which shall be sold by the United States subsequent to the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to the said State to be used as a permanent fund, the interest of which only shall be expended for the support of the common schools within said State. And there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of five million dollars for the use and benefit of the common schools of said State. Said appropriation shall be paid by the Treasurer of the United States at such time and to such person or persons as may be authorized by said State to receive the same under laws to be enacted by said State, and until said State shall enact such laws said appropriation shall not be paid. Said appropriation of five million dollars shall be held inviolable and invested by said State, in trust, for the use and benefit of said schools.

"SEC. 33. That all lands herein granted for educational purposes may be appraised and disposed of only at public sale, the proceeds to constitute a permanent school fund, the income from which only shall be expended in the support of said schools. But said lands may, under such regulations as the legislature shall prescribe, be leased for periods of not more than ten years, and such common school land shall not be subject to preemption, homestead entry, or any other entry under the land laws of the United States, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, but shall be reserved for school purposes only.

"SEC. 34. That in lieu of the grant of land for purposes of internal improvement made to new States by the eighth section of the act of September fourth, eighteen hundred and forty-one, which section is hereby repealed as to the proposed State, and in lieu of any claim or demand by the said State under the act of September twenty-eighth, eighteen hundred and fifty, and section twenty-four hundred and seventy-nine of the Revised Statutes, making a grant of swamp and overflowed lands to certain States, which grant it is hereby declared is not extended to the said State, and in lieu of any grant of saline lands to said State, save as heretofore made, the following grants of land from public lands of the United States within said State are hereby made, to wit:

"SEC. 35. That all lands granted in quantity or as indemnity by this act shall be selected, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, from the unappropriated public lands of the United States within the limits of the said State, by a commission composed of the governor, surveyor-general, and attorney-general of said State; and no fees shall be charged for passing the title to the same or for the preliminary proceedings thereof.

"SEC. 36. That all mineral lands shall be exempted from the grants made by this act; but if any portion thereof shall be found by the Department of the Interior to be mineral lands, said State, by the commission provided in section thirty-five hereof, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, is hereby authorized and empowered to select, in legal subdivisions, an equal quantity of other unappropriated lands in said State in lieu thereof.

There shall be appointed for each of said districts one district judge, one United States attorney, and one United States marshal. The judge of each of said districts shall receive a yearly salary the same as other similar judges of the United States, payable as provided for by law, and shall reside in the district to which he is appointed. The regular terms of said courts shall be held in said districts, at the places aforesaid, on the first Monday in April and the first Monday in November of each year, and one grand jury shall be summoned in each year in each of said circuit and district courts. The marshal, district attorney, and clerks of the circuit and district courts of said districts, and all other officers and persons performing duties in the administration of justice therein, shall severally possess the powers and perform the duties lawfully possessed and required to be performed by similar officers in other districts of the United States, and shall, for the services they may perform, receive the fees and compensation now allowed by law to officers performing similar services for the United States in the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, respectively.

"SEC. 38. That all cases of appeal or writ of error heretofore prosecuted and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States upon any record from the supreme court of either of said Territories, or that may hereafter lawfully be prosecuted upon any record from said courts, may be heard and determined by said Supreme Court of the United States. And the mandate of execution or of further proceedings shall be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the circuit or district courts, respectively, hereby established within the said State or to the supreme court of such State, as the nature of the case may require. And the circuit, district, and State courts herein named shall, respectively, be the successors of the supreme courts of the said Territories as to all such cases arising within the limits embraced within the jurisdiction of such courts, respectively, with full power to proceed with the same and award mesne or final process therein; and that from all judgments and decrees of the supreme courts of the said Territories mentioned in this act, in any case arising within the limits of the proposed State prior to admission, the parties to such judgment shall have the same right to prosecute appeals and writs of error to the Supreme Court of the United States or to the circuit court of appeals as they shall have had by law prior to the admission of said State into the Union.

"SEC. 39. That in respect to all cases, proceedings, and matters now pending in the supreme or district courts of the said Territories at the time of the admission into the Union of the said State, the courts established by such State shall, respectively, be the successors of said supreme and district Territorial courts; and all the files, records, indictments, and proceedings relating to any such cases shall be transferred to such circuit, district, and State courts, respectively, and the same shall be proceeded with therein in due course of law; but no writ, action, indictment, cause, or proceeding now pending, or that prior to the admission of the State shall be pending, in any Territorial court in said Territories shall abate by the admission of such State into the Union, but the same shall be transferred and proceeded with in the proper United States circuit, district, or State court, as the case may be: Provided, however, That in all civil actions, causes, and proceedings in which the United States is not a party transfers shall not be made to the circuit and district courts of the United States except upon cause shown by written request of one of the parties to such action or proceeding filed in the proper court; and in the absence of such request such cases shall be proceeded with in the proper State courts.

"SEC. 40. That the constitutional convention shall by ordinance provide for the election of officers for a full State government, including members of the legislature and two Representatives in Congress, at the time for the election for the ratification or rejection of the constitution; one of which Representatives shall be chosen from a Congressional district comprised of the present Territory of Arizona, to be known as the First Congressional district, and the other from a Congressional district comprised of the remainder of said State, to be known as the Second Congressional district; but the said State government shall remain in abeyance until the State shall be admitted into the Union as proposed by this act. In case the constitution of said State shall be ratified by a majority of the legal voters in each of said Territories voting at the election held therefor as hereinbefore provided, but not otherwise, the legislature thereof may assemble at Santa Fe, organize, and elect two Senators of the United States in the manner now prescribed by the laws of the United States; and the governor and secretary of state of the proposed State shall certify the election of the Senators and Representatives in the manner required by law, and when such State is admitted into the Union, as provided in this act, the Senators and Representatives shall be entitled to be admitted to seats in Congress and to all rights and privileges of Senators and Representatives of other States in the Congress of the United States; and the officers of the State government formed in pursuance of said constitution, as provided by the constitutional convention, shall proceed to exercise all the functions of State officers; and all laws of said Territories in force at the time of their admission into the Union shall be in force in the respective portions of said State until changed by the legislature of said State, except as modified or changed by this act or by the constitution of the State; and the laws of the United States shall have the same force and effect within the said States as elsewhere within the United States.

"SEC. 41. That the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for defraying all and every kind and character of expense incident to the elections and conventions provided for in this act; that is, the payment of the expenses of registration and holding the election for members of the constitutional convention and the election for the ratification of the constitution, at the same rates that are paid for similar services under the Territorial laws, respectively, and for the payment of the mileage for and salaries of members of the constitutional convention at the same rates that are paid the said Territorial legislatures under national law, and for the payment of all proper and necessary expenses, officers, clerks, and messengers thereof, and printing and other expenses incident thereto: Provided, That any expense incurred in excess of said sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars shall be paid by said State. The said money shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and shall be forwarded, to be locally expended in the present Territory of Arizona and in the present Territory of New Mexico, through the respective secretaries of said Territories, as may be necessary and proper, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, in order to carry out the full intent and meaning of this act.

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States."

E. L. HAMILTON,
A. L. BRICK,

I agree to the above recommendations except as to amendment numbered 40; on this amendment I disagree.

JOHN A. MOON,
Managers on the part of the House.

WM. P. DILLINGHAM,
ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE,

I agree to the above and foregoing recommendations except as to amendment numbered 40; and as to said amendment I disagree.

T. M. PATTERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT OF THE MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 12707, to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of Arizona and New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, submit the following detailed statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the conference report, namely:

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 14, and agree to the same with amendments, to the effect that the delegates to a constitutional convention of the proposed State of Oklahoma shall be 111—55 to be elected by the people of the Territory of Oklahoma, 55 by the people of the Indian Territory, and 1 from the Osage Indian Reservation—with a provision for establishing voting precincts in said Osage Reservation for that purpose, and also provisions for districts in Oklahoma Territory, except the Osage Reservation, and for districts in the Indian Territory from which such delegates to said constitutional convention shall be elected.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15 and agrees to the same. This amendment is a provision similar in character to the House provisions on the same subject, and provides in detail the election machinery for the election of all delegates to the constitutional convention and for laws governing the same.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agrees to the same with an amendment to the effect that the capital of the proposed State of Oklahoma shall temporarily remain at Guthrie and not be changed therefrom till after 1913, and provides that no State moneys shall be appropriated for the erection of public buildings there for capital purposes during that period, except as shall be necessary for the convenient transaction of public business of the State at said capital.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment which does no more than to change the words of the original House text, without any change in the effect of the House provision.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the Senate amendments numbered 18, 21, and 22, and agrees to the same. These are all verbal changes and additions of words without altering the intended effect of the House bill.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 19 and 20, and agrees to the same. These amendments provide for the sale and use of alcohol in the part of the proposed State now covered by Indian Territory and in certain Indian reservations in Oklahoma by apothecaries, to be used by them in compounding medicines, and regulates its use by them and provides for a bond that it shall not be used for other purposes.

The House recedes from its disagreement to Senate amendment numbered 26, which is a slight and immaterial change as to the time of payments of interest on State funds.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the Senate amendment numbered 27, and agrees to the same with an amendment which eliminates all of said Senate amendment numbered 27 and provides by an amendment that all State lands valuable for minerals, including gas and oil, shall not be sold by the State of Oklahoma prior to 1915, but that such lands may be leased for mineral purposes for periods not to exceed five years, which leasing must be made by public competition, advertised for not less than thirty days, under sealed bids, and awarded to the highest responsible bidder, who shall pay a fixed royalty in addition to the bonus offered in his bid, such leases not to be transferred without consent in writing by the proper officer of the State; and that an agricultural lessee of such mineral lands shall be reimbursed by the mining lessee for all damage done to his leasehold interest by such mining operations. The legislature of the State may legislate upon the subject, not in conflict with this act.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, which is a slight and immaterial verbal change explanatory of text.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, and 34, and agrees to the same.

These amendments add Tulsa and Chickasha to the court towns provided for in the House bill, and arrange for terms of court to be held at such additional places.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 35 and 36. These are verbal changes merely and do not change the intent of the House provision in relation to the fees of officers of the Federal courts, which is the subject of the clause amended.

The Senate recedes from its amendments numbered 37 and 38, leaving the House bill unaltered in the matter to which such amendments relate.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 39, and agrees to the same.

This amendment provides that the Osage Indian Reservation shall be and remain one county until its lands are allotted in severalty, and, further, until changed by the legislature of Oklahoma.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agrees to the same with an amendment, to which the Senate agrees, and which amendment agreed to reinstates the original text of the House bill on the subject of statehood for Arizona and New Mexico, with certain changes to the effect as follows:

The House bill provides that thirty days after the approval of this act the President shall order an election of delegates to a constitutional convention. This has been changed to twenty days on account of the shortness of time, caused by delay in this legislation, and for the same reason the election of delegates, which was fixed in the original House bill on the tenth Tuesday following the approval of this act, is changed by this agreement to the fifth Tuesday. For the same reason the time of holding the constitutional convention has been changed from the fifth Monday after the election of delegates to the second Monday, and instead of receiving compensation for not more than sixty days' service the delegates can receive compensation for not more than thirty days' service.

A further change of the House bill on this subject has been made which requires an election to be held for the adoption or rejection of the constitution on November 6, 1906, and that if a majority of each of said Territories shall be for the constitution, then and in that event statehood shall be perfected by the proclamation of the President, as provided by the original House bill; otherwise not.

This change from the original House bill, which finds force and effect in these words of the conferees' agreement referred to, to wit, "and if a majority of the legal votes cast on that question in each of said Territories shall be for the constitution," then statehood shall be perfected, means that if the majority of the voters of either Arizona or New Mexico shall vote to reject, then there shall be no statehood and each of these Territories shall be left in statu quo; but if a majority of both these Territories shall vote at said election to ratify the constitution, then they will be perfected into statehood under the name of Arizona under the provisions of the bill.

The other provisions of the conferees' amendment agreed to, relative to the subject of statehood for Arizona and New Mexico, designated as No. 40, follow the original provisions of the House bill with a few immaterial changes.

E. L. HAMILTON,
A. L. BRICK,
JOHN A. MOON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HAMILTON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the report.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, before that is done I would like to say a word or two.

Mr. HAMILTON. Very well; but I want first to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, if that will answer the purposes of the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am quite willing.

Mr. HAMILTON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentlemen on the Committee on Territories, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the report of the majority and the views of the minority on the statehood bill. There are facts in that report that ought to be preserved, and the copies are about all gone.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the reports of the majority and the minority upon the bill indicated may be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The reports are as follows:

[House Report No. 496, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on the Territories, to whom was referred H. R. 12707, to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, report same back to the House of Representatives, and recommend that it do pass.

ANALYSIS OF BILL.

This bill, under a single title and enacting clause, enables two States to be admitted into the Union.

It consists of forty-three sections, the first eighteen of which relate to the proposed State of Oklahoma, the area of which is to comprise the present Territory of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory; and the remaining seventeen sections relate to the proposed State of Arizona, the area of which is to comprise the present Territories of New Mexico and Arizona.

The whole bill is drawn to conform as nearly as may be to the language of previous enabling acts, and contains such provisions as may in their nature be common to all, besides such additional provisions as are made necessary by existing laws, Indian treaties, and local conditions.

The sections framed to provide similar objects for each of the proposed new States are made to conform as nearly as may be with each other.

The State of Arizona can be admitted into the Union not earlier than about seven and a half months and not later than about eleven months after the approval of this act.

Each State is to be admitted into the Union by a proclamation of the President of the United States, in the usual manner, after compliance with certain requirements.

An election which is equitably and properly safeguarded is provided for delegates to a constitutional convention for each proposed State. The convention for Oklahoma is to consist of 112 delegates and that for Arizona of 110 delegates.

The constitution framed must in each case conform to the usual requirements and be submitted to the people of each proposed State, respectively, for ratification at an election to be held for that purpose.

Each State is divided into two judicial districts, and the proper officials are provided therefor. The Federal courts of the proposed State of Oklahoma are attached to the eighth judicial circuit, and the Federal courts of the proposed State of Arizona are attached to the ninth judicial circuit.

Proper provision is made in the usual way for pending causes in the Territorial courts during the transition.

Oklahoma is allowed five and Arizona two Members of the House of Representatives, representation being based on the last census, and each State is divided into Congressional districts.

Proper provision is made in each State for nonsectarian common schools and the teaching of English therein.

Suffrage is well guarded, and strong antipolygamy clauses are in the bill.

The new States are to assume and pay the debts of the Territories, respectively.

The capital of Oklahoma is fixed at Guthrie until 1915, and that of Arizona at Santa Fe until the same year, at which time it is expected that conditions will have so shaped themselves that State capitals may be established by elections provided for that purpose, with entire fairness to all parts of the States concerned.

Oklahoma is given 2 sections of nonmineral land in each township within the present Territory of Oklahoma for the support and maintenance of a system of public nonsectarian common schools, besides certain specific donations of land for its educational and other institutions. Oklahoma is also given the sum of $5,000,000 in lieu of lands which can not be set apart for school purposes within the present limits of Indian Territory, because such lands are owned by the Indians and because of the great expense to which the new State will be put in establishing a system of common schools where none now exist.

The State of Arizona, as in the case of Utah, because of the arid character of the land, is given 4 sections of nonmineral land in each township for the support of common schools. It is also given, as is usual, certain specific donations of land for the educational and other institutions. In addition thereto, because of the arid character of the land, the proposed State of Arizona is given the sum of $5,000,000, to be safely invested by the State in trust for the use and benefit of the common schools thereof.

Each State, as is usual, after admission is to receive 5 per cent of the cash realized from the sale of public lands within the State, to form a permanent fund, the interest of which only can be used for the maintenance of its common schools, and the usual restrictions, requirements, and safeguards are thrown around all of these donations to each of the States.

An appropriation of $100,000 for the State of Oklahoma and of $150,000 for the State of Arizona, or so much thereof in each case as may be necessary, is made for defraying the expenses of the conventions provided for in the bill, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

It is provided that until the admission of the proposed States the Territorial officers shall continue to perform their duties as at present in the respective Territories.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR STATEHOOD.

Article IV, section 3, of the Constitution of the United States provides that "new States may be admitted by Congress into the Union," but the Constitution nowhere defines the qualifications of Territories for statehood. Congress therefore has discretion as to what conditions shall be required of Territories seeking admission as States.

When the Constitution was adopted this Republic had a population of less than 4,000,000 and comprehended the thirteen original States as then bounded, together with the Northwest Territory.

The ordinance of 1787 provided for the temporary government and future division of the Northwest Territory into States, to be admitted "whenever any of said States shall have 60,000 free inhabitants therein."

This rule of 60,000 population for Territories seeking admission as States was for sometime observed more or less closely.

Subsequently, in the case of Kansas, another rule was adopted requiring a population equal to the unit of representation in the House of Representatives, which was not thereafter adhered to.

Nevada, which was admitted with an area of 109,901 square miles and a population of 42,491 in 1864, by the census of 1900 had a population of 42,335, about one-fifth of the population of a Congressional district under the last apportionment.

Of course area alone can not be considered as a controlling qualification. A vast area might never be capable of sustaining a sufficient population.

This nation now has a population of 80,000,000, and undoubtedly, without attempting to make any hard-and-fast rule as to population of Territories seeking admission as States, the population of such Territories should bear some reasonable relation in number and character to the great body of the population of the Republic.

ARIZONA.

Arizona was a part of the territory acquired from the Republic of Mexico by the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo, February 2, 1848, and by the Gadsden purchase of December 30, 1853, and was a part of the original Territory of New Mexico, from which it was separated and organized into a Territory in 1863.

It is 378 miles long by 339 miles wide and contains 112,920 square miles, or 73,000,000 acres. By the census of 1900 it has a population of 122,931, of whom 26,480 are Indians, being 1.1 persons to the square mile.

It is true that the census of 1900 is claimed to be inaccurate in that it does not give Arizona as many people as are claimed were there, and Arizona claims a population of not less than 175,000; but this committee does not feel warranted in adopting speculative estimates; besides, the highest estimates do not change the situation upon which the committee bases its decision.

Of the population other than Indians, about 80 per cent are estimated by Governor Brodie to be Americans, as contradistinguished from inhabitants of Mexican derivation; and of all the population, not counting Indians, Governor Brodie estimates only about 1 per cent of illiteracy. The character of the population is of such high order that it stands above detraction and needs no commendation.

The Territory has a university, two normal schools, and an excellent common school system.

Its newspapers are ably managed and edited.

It has a total assessed valuation of taxable property as shown by the report of the Secretary of the Interior, of $57,920,372.84, but it is probable that its property is returned for taxation at a comparatively small percentage of its market value, in some instances, as indicated by Government reports, at not over 5 per cent of its actual value.

Its lands are valuable for agriculture only as irrigated, and its irrigable lands are chiefly in the valleys of the Salt River, the Gila, the Colorado, the Little Colorado, and their tributaries. If irrigation under the national irrigation law shall prove successful, soil of wonderful fertility, otherwise of little value, will attract immigration, but irrigation under that law is in the experimental stage.

In arid regions the rainfall is torrential and runs rapidly off the baked surface of the earth into channels, through which it comes down in floods of no value unless impounded for irrigation purposes.

Months and sometimes years intervene between heavy rains, and it is the purpose of the Government to impound the water from rainfall and from snow on the mountains and distribute it systematically.

The average annual rainfall in Arizona varies from 5.86 inches at Gila Bend to 22.24 inches at Flagstaff, the increased precipitation at Flagstaff being due to the proximity of the mountains.

Stock raising is at present a more important industry in Arizona than agriculture.

The forest area in Arizona is the largest in the United States and covers 6,400,000 acres.

Its chief industry is mining, and while great mineral wealth has already been developed, it is asserted that its mineral resources so far as developed are small as compared with its possibilities.

The Territory has within its limits about 1,400 miles of railroad.

NEW MEXICO.

New Mexico was acquired from the Republic of Mexico by the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo, February 2, 1848, and by the Gadsden purchase of December 30, 1853.

It is 360 miles north and south by 346 miles east and west, and contains 122,580 square miles, or 78,451,200 acres, on which, by the census of 1900, live a population of 195,310, being 1.6 persons to the square mile.

As in the case of Arizona, the census is claimed to be inaccurate, and the governor of New Mexico in his annual report for 1905 claims a population of not less than 300,000; but here again the committee does not feel warranted in accepting speculative estimates.

This committee considers the criticism as ill informed which finds fault with New Mexico because of its alleged foreign population.

Out of a population of 195,310 New Mexico has only 13,625 foreign-born inhabitants, a smaller foreign-born percentage than most of the States of the Union.

New Mexico was made a Territory in 1850, and ever since that time the people of that Territory have been electing their own legislatures, making their own laws, conducting their own local government, and contributing revenue to the Federal Treasury.

Were it not that the two-fifths of its population which are native born but of Spanish descent have been heretofore erroneously referred to as foreign, it would be an aspersion upon a patriotic people even to refer to their loyalty. The remaining three-fifths of its population are of the same character as the people of Arizona.

During the civil war, out of a total population of 93,567 New Mexico sent 6,561 men to fight for the Union, and in our war with Spain 1,089 men enlisted, of whom 500 were "Rough Riders."

The assessed valuation of property within the Territory for the year 1905 was $42,578,792.68, but it is asserted that for purposes of taxation property is not returned at much more than 20 per cent of its market value.

Its indebtedness June 30, 1905, was $853,000, and its sinking fund on hand to meet its obligations was $60,164.94.

The Territory has a capitol building erected at a cost of $200,000; a penitentiary, valued at $500,000; a college of agricultural and mechanical arts, valued at $150,000; an asylum for the insane, valued at $180,000; a school of mines, valued at $65,000; a university, valued at $60,000; two normal schools, each valued at $60,000; a military institute, valued at $50,000, and other institutions for which large appropriations have been made.

It has an excellent common school system, the buildings alone being worth $2,000,000, and the actual enrollment of pupils for the year 1905, according to the governor's report, being 36,111, and besides its common schools and Territorial institutions it has over fifty sectarian schools, conducted by various religious denominations, with an enrollment of over 6,000 pupils.

All these institutions and the public school system of New Mexico have been built and sustained by the Territory without the aid of the Federal Government, except by the usual grant of sections 16 and 36 for school purposes, made in 1898, from which rentals have only recently commenced to be received.

New Mexico has seventy-five weekly newspapers and six dailies.

Agriculture in New Mexico is conducted by irrigation along the river valleys of the San Juan, Rio Grande, the Mimbres, the Canadian, the Cimarron, the Gila, the Pecos, their tributaries, and some smaller valleys.

Stock raising is the principal industry.

What has been said of the rainfall of Arizona applies to New Mexico, except that the average annual rainfall of New Mexico is a trifle more than that of Arizona.

The mining industry of New Mexico is said to be rapidly developing, and it has about 2,600 miles of railroad.

After giving full consideration to conditions in both Territories this committee recommends the admission of Arizona and New Mexico joined in a single State, to be known as "Arizona."

The name Arizona is retained as the better name in the choice between the names of the two Territories, one of which the committee feels ought to be given to the proposed State.

The area of the proposed State, though vast, will be about 27,000 square miles less than that of Texas.

If national irrigation shall succeed and mining industry shall fulfill its flattering promise, the proposed State may become great in population, wealth, and resources, but at present the population on the vast area proposed to be admitted as a State is only a little more than one person to the square mile, and is settled in river valleys, with mountains and vast arid wastes between which can never support a population.

The population of the proposed State, in the opinion of this committee, has the educational, moral, and other elements to entitle it to citizenship of a State and of the United States.

The people of Arizona and New Mexico have developed the resources of their Territories to the best of their ability under present conditions, and as a State, with the aid of Federal irrigation, they will undoubtedly develop to the utmost the latent resources of their vast domain.

OKLAHOMA AND INDIAN TERRITORY.

As to Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, this committee favor their joinder in one State.

Oklahoma has an area of 38,830 square miles, or 24,979,200 acres, and by the census of 1900 a population of 398,331.

Indian Territory, which for convenience we shall refer to as a Territory, although it has no Territorial organization, has an area of 31,000 square miles, or 19,840,000 acres, and by the census of 1900 a population of 392,060.

It is conceded by everyone who has had opportunity for observation that since the census of 1900 the population of both Oklahoma and the Indian Territory has increased with amazing rapidity, until their aggregate population is now probably nearly a million and a half.

There are probably no better farming lands in the United States than those in these Territories, and vast areas which were unoccupied in 1900 have been rapidly settled upon since that time.

Under the so-called "Curtis Act" provision was made for the organization of towns in the Indian Territory, and towns have been organized all over the Territory, having populations which are increasing with astonishing rapidity.

The arbitrary and irregular boundary line between Oklahoma and the Indian Territory is in itself an argument in favor of their joinder in one State, and indicates the progress made up to date in the gradual addition of Indian reservations to original Oklahoma, which, at the outset, constituted only about one-eighth of the present Territory of Oklahoma.

Indian Territory, as originally set apart in 1834, practically comprehended what are now known as Oklahoma and Indian Territory, except that Beaver County, formerly known as "No Man's Land," was added to Oklahoma by act of Congress May 2, 1890.

Original Oklahoma, containing about 3,000,000 acres in the heart of what now constitutes Oklahoma, was opened to settlement April 2, 1889, but no form of government was provided for the country so opened to settlement until May 2, 1890, when the organic act of the Territory of Oklahoma was approved.

By that organic act it is provided "that all that portion of the United States now known as Indian Territory, except so much as is actually occupied by the Five Civilized Tribes and the Indian tribes within the Quapaw Indian Agency, and except the unoccupied part of the Cherokee Outlet, together with that part of the United States known as the 'Public Land Strip,' is hereby erected into a temporary government by the name of the Territory of Oklahoma. * * * Whenever the interests of the Cherokee Indians in the land known as the 'Cherokee Outlet' shall have been extinguished and the President shall make proclamation thereof, said Outlet shall thereupon, and without further legislation, become a part of the Territory of Oklahoma. Any other lands within the Indian Territory not embraced within these boundaries shall hereafter become a part of the Territory of Oklahoma whenever the Indian nation or a tribe owning such lands shall signify to the President of the United States in legal manner its assent that such lands shall so become a part of the Territory of Oklahoma, and the President shall thereupon make proclamation of the same."

By this organic act it is apparent that it was not intended to draw any line of division between Oklahoma and Indian Territory, but that Oklahoma should increase in geographical scope from time to time within the limits of the original Indian Territory, by the addition of "any other lands within the Indian Territory * * * whenever the Indian Nation or a tribe owning such lands shall signify to the President of the United States in legal manner its assent."

It is therefore apparent from this organic act that it was the intention of Congress that the original Indian Territory, together with the strip of land running westward to the east line of New Mexico and formerly known as "No Man's Land," should eventually become one State.

Original Oklahoma has been increased and opened to settlement as follows:

1. In 1890, by the addition of the Sauk and Fox, Iowa, and Potawatomi Indian reservations, containing 1,283,434 acres, in the eastern part of what is now Oklahoma Territory, and the addition of the Cheyenne and Arapaho reservations, containing 4,297,771 acres, in the western part of what is now Oklahoma Territory;

2. In 1893, by the addition of the Cherokee Strip, containing 6,014,239 acres;

3. In 1895, by the addition of the Kickapoo Reservation, containing 206,662 acres;

4. In 1896, by the addition of Greer County by decision of the Supreme Court of the United States; and

5. In 1901, by the addition of the Kiowa, Comanche, Apache, and Wichita reservations.

Within the present limits of Oklahoma there are still reserved from settlement the Osage, Ponca, and Oto reservations, and the Kiowa and Comanche pasture reservations, in all amounting to about 2,000,000 acres.

Oklahoma Territory, so formed, is now divided into twenty-six counties, traversed by not less than 3,000 miles of railroad.

In its report on the statehood bill in the Fifty-eighth Congress, the committee, referring to the resources of Oklahoma, said:

"In 1903 the wheat crop of Oklahoma was over 36,000,000 bushels; the corn crop 65,000,000 bushels; the cotton crop over 200,000 bales; and 1,036,662 cattle, 304,713 horses, 234,218 sheep, and 63,452 mules were scheduled for taxation.

"It has 280 grain elevators, 66 flouring mills, and 232 cotton gins.

"It has 79 national banks and 247 Territorial banks, the aggregate deposits in which on January 1, 1904, amounted to $22,456,510.

"It has 250 weekly newspapers, 28 daily newspapers, besides monthly and semimonthly publications.

"It has 191,433 children of school age and 2,192 district schoolhouses."

While definite statements of the resources of the Territory for the year 1905 have not been obtainable in all cases, from all information available it is clear that there has been a substantial increase in production, wealth, and population in the Territory. It has a university, an agricultural and mechanical college, normal schools, a university preparatory school, and a colored agricultural and normal university, besides denominational and private educational institutions.

By the provisions of the organic act, and by various acts of Congress opening Indian reservations to settlement, 2,055,500 acres of land have been reserved for the benefit of common schools, colleges, normal schools, public buildings, and for charitable and penal institutions.

Mineral deposits are said to have been found in the Wichita Mountains; oil, coal, and gas have been discovered in various parts of the Territory, and salt and gypsum beds cover thousands of acres.

Construing the organic act of Oklahoma according to its obvious intent, that all the lands within the original limits of the Indian Territory should eventually be merged into the Territory of Oklahoma and thereafter into a State, the question to be determined is whether the so-called Indian Territory is ready to be joined with Oklahoma in a State, and whether it may be so joined equitably so far as the Indians of Indian Territory are concerned.

The Indian Territory is not an organized Territory, but is an area of land occupied by the Five Civilized Tribes, viz, the Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Cherokees, and Seminoles, and certain small tribes in the northeast corner of the Indian Territory who hold their lands by patent.

These Five Civilized Tribes moved westward from certain of the Southern States with their slaves, and settled upon the lands comprehended within the original limits of the Indian Territory, under various treaties with the Federal Government.

These treaties provided in effect, among other things, that the Five Tribes should have tribal governments of their own.

Having come from the South, their sympathies were naturally with the South in the civil war, although many of the Indians in the northern part of the Territory kept faith with the Federal Government.

In 1865 and 1866 treaties of peace were made with the Indians whereby they acknowledged the sovereignty of the United States and agreed to abide by the Federal laws.

In 1866 certain of the Indians ceded the use of their lands west of the present line of the Indian Territory to the Government for the occupancy of certain tribes of friendly Indians, and in 1889 the Creek and Seminole sold their interest in these lands outright to the United States. Thereupon followed the organization of original Oklahoma and the addition thereto of territory as hereinbefore described.

Meanwhile white people have been emigrating to the Indian Territory in constantly increasing numbers until now, when the Dawes Commission estimates the number of people in the Indian Territory at about 700,000, of whom only about 70,000 are estimated to be Indians.

In 1893 the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, commonly called the "Dawes Commission," was created. For the first five years of its existence, down to the passage of the so-called "Curtis law," the Commission was given only the power of negotiation, except that under the law of June 10, 1896, they were given limited authority in relation to citizenship rights.

By the Curtis Act, however, its authority was extended so that the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes now has authority for the "extinguishment of the national or tribal title to any lands within that Territory (the Indian Territory) now held by any or all of such nations or tribes, either by cession of the same, or some part thereof, to the United States, or by the allotment and division of the same in severalty among the Indians of such nations or tribes."

The act of June 10, 1896, empowered the Commission to determine applications for citizenship presented within ninety days from the date of the act, and even under that law "applications embracing approximately 75,000 claimants were judicially determined."

The business of the Dawes Commission, as finally defined by various statutes and Indian agreements supplemental thereto, was "to administer upon five great estates," composed of about $10,000,000 of trust funds and 19,511,889.39 acres of land, as follows:

Choctaw Nation	6,950,043.66
Chickasaw Nation	4,703,108.05
Cherokee Nation	4,420,070.13
Creek Nation	3,072,813.16
Seminole Nation	365,854.39

This business did not relate to the disposition of wild lands or lands of uniform value. "It related to vast tracts, covered by the houses and other improvements of a great population, threaded in every direction with railroads, filled with villages and large towns of the most modern character," and without a wigwam or blanket Indian within the limits of the Territory.

It became the duty of the Commission to determine—

First. Who were the bona fide citizens entitled to possess these properties; and Second. To take an inventory of the properties to be divided, and to apportion them equitably in severalty.

THE PEOPLE AND THEIR CONDITION.

Aside from the population which has been attracted to the Territory, there are five distinct classes of people having common property and citizenship rights, but differing widely in racial characteristics, viz:

1. The so-called full-blood Indian.
2. People of mixed blood ranging from an almost infinitesimal infusion of Indian blood to nearly full-blood Indians.
3. Intermarried whites.
4. Negroes, called freedmen, who were slaves or are the descendants of former slaves of Indians.
5. Adopted citizens.

According to the recent Bonaparte report these five classes constitute about one-fifth of the inhabitants of the Territory, and of them "at least three-fourths are Indians in little more than name, with from 75 to 99 per cent of white blood, and in great majority altogether indistinguishable in appearance, language, and manners from white people."

These people of mixed blood are, as a rule, intelligent, educated, and competent to manage their own affairs.

The remaining four-fifths of the inhabitants of the Territory have no connection whatever with the tribes and are white people, with a small percentage of negroes, attracted from the various States of the Union, whose citizenship in the States from which they came has qualified them for statehood.

It therefore appears that of the whole population of the Indian Territory scarcely one-twentieth are full-blood Indians.

By the Curtis Act and various agreements with the five nations, tribal courts were abolished July 1, 1898, and all tribal relations and governments of the five nations are to cease March 4, 1906.

The government of Indian Territory at present is a government by the Secretary of the Interior, by four Federal judges having jurisdiction in four several districts, and by various commissioners, which courts and commissioners administer the Federal law together with an extension of a part of the Arkansas Code. This government is known in Indian Territory as "court government."

Indian Territory is without adequate schools, so far as white people are concerned, and is without asylums for the deaf, dumb, blind, and insane.

The only provision for free schools in the Territory is in the Curtis Act, which provides for free schools in the incorporated towns.

Outside the incorporated towns the various Indian governments maintain schools, but it is asserted that at least 100,000 white children outside incorporated towns are without free educational opportunities, and that a large white population is growing up in ignorance.

ALLOTMENT.

As to the inventory of "properties to be divided" by the Dawes Commission. Nothing is owned in common in the Indian Territory except the lands and tribal funds. The act of June 28, 1898, known as the Curtis Act, provided for "the making of rolls of citizens and the allotment of lands in the five nations in the Indian Territory;" and pursuant to the provisions of that law various agreements and supplemental agreements have been made with the Five Civilized Tribes providing for the allotment of lands, the divisions of tribal funds, and the abolishment of tribal governments after March 4, 1906. Under this law "and the agreements with the tribes, and acts of Congress amendatory and supplementary thereof, the Commission has proceeded to make rolls of citizens of each of the tribes, appraise the land preparatory to allotment, estimate timber, set apart land for town sites over a large part of the Territory, subdivide the United States Geological Survey sectional survey into quarter sections and in some places quarter-quarter sections, make improvement plats of the land surveyed, and to allot the land to the individual members of the tribes." The Commission was also authorized to segregate coal lands in the Choctaw and Cherokee country.

According to the Tenth Annual Report of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, "the survey and appraisement work of the Commission is finished."

As to coal and asphalt lands the Dawes Commission reports that the lands segregated under the provisions of the act approved July 1, 1902, cover an area of 444,863.03 acres. These lands are not subject to allotment.

As to the progress of the Commission in the enrollment of citizens and the allotment of lands, the so-called "Bonaparte report," transmitted to Congress by the President March 7, 1904, is as follows:

"In the Seminole Nation the roll has been completed and finally approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

"In the Creek Nation the enrollment work is 97½ per cent completed.

"In the Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Cherokee nations the enrollment work is between 90 and 95 per cent completed.

"All of the land in each nation has been appraised and valued in tracts of 40 acres, and where timber of commercial value was found on the land the timber on each 40 was estimated and valued.

"Approximately 12,000 sectional improvement plats have been made and are now used in the different land offices, and this work has been completed as far as it is deemed necessary to carry it.

"In the Seminole Nation all selections of allotments have been made, and the only work remaining to be done in that nation is the disposing of surplus lands, for which no provision of law exists, and the issuing of deeds.

"In the Creek Nation practically all allotments have been made, and more than 60 per cent of the allottees have received allotment and homestead deeds to their lands. These deeds are prepared by the Commission, and, when executed, recorded by it.

"In the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations approximately 45 per cent of allotments have been made.

"In the Cherokee Nation approximately 25 per cent of allotments have been made. Under instructions from the Secretary of the Interior all proceedings looking to the allotment of land in the Cherokee Nation have been suspended since October 7, 1903, in accordance with the act of Congress relative to the segregations of lands, to await the decision of the then pending suit in the United States Supreme Court between the Delawares and Cherokees.

"Allotment-selection contests are being kept well up in the different nations. This involves in each case, of which there are already between 2,000 and 3,000, practically a court trial to determine title to improvements on land.

"No statement is attempted to be made of the incidental work that has arisen in the different nations from time to time, much of which has, however, been of considerable magnitude.

"It will be seen, therefore, at this time that the work for which the Commission was created, and which has been its constant aim during its existence, namely, 'the extinguishment of the national or tribal title to any lands within that Territory,' is well advanced toward completion. The work in the Seminole Nation is complete as far as it is possible to complete it under existing legislation. The work in the Creek Nation is substantially finished. It is estimated that the work in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations will be ended by March 31, 1905, and in the Cherokee Nation by July 1, 1905. And when all tribal title to land in Indian Territory shall have been extinguished, and final disposition made of all of the affairs of the Five Tribes, the work will have cost the Government less than 10 cents per acre."

Approximately 1,750,000 acres, including coal lands, will not be used in making allotments.

CHEROKEE NATION.

Total acreage subject to allotment	4,400,304.76
Allotted to October 7, 1903	1,055,892.07
Unallotted	3,344,412.69

2. HOW LONG WILL IT TAKE TO FINISH THE ALLOTMENT?

In its report on the statehood bill in the Fifty-eighth Congress, the committee said:

"Seminole Nation.—Allotment is completed.

"Creek Nation.—Allotment is substantially completed.

"Choctaw and Chickasaw nations.—On December 31, 1903, allotment offices had been in operation seven and a half months, and at that time approximately one-third of the work of allotment had been completed. It is estimated that practically all allotments in those nations will have been made in fifteen months from December 31, 1903, or by March 31, 1905.

"Cherokee Nation.—Allotment office had been in operation approximately eight and one-fourth months, when work was suspended on October 7, 1903, under instructions from the Secretary of the Interior, pending an adjudication of the rights of Delaware members of the tribe. No allotments have been made since that date. During the time the office was in operation approximately one-fourth of the work of allotment was completed. It is estimated that with some increase in the allotting force of the office, practically all allotment work in the Cherokee Nation can be completed in fifteen months from the date when the office shall be reopened."

Since that report was made the allotment of lands has been proceeding and is approaching the end. The Interior Department states that by the first of the next fiscal year all allotments will undoubtedly be completed, except in cases where the citizenship of the parties is still under investigation or where the land is involved in contest proceedings.

In his annual message, December 4, 1905, the President said:

"I recommend that Indian Territory and Oklahoma be admitted as one State and that New Mexico and Arizona be admitted as one State. There is no obligation upon us to treat territorial subdivisions, which are matters of convenience only, as binding us on the question of admission to statehood. Nothing has taken up more time in the Congress during the past few years than the question as to statehood to be granted to the four Territories above mentioned, and after careful consideration of all that has been developed in the discussions of the question I recommend that they be immediately admitted as two States. There is no justification for further delay, and the advisability of making the four Territories into two States has been clearly established."

CONCLUSION.

Inasmuch, then, as in the opinion of this committee, the Congress intended by the organic act of the Territory of Oklahoma, that all of the original Indian Territory, together with what is now Beaver County, should become one State; and

Inasmuch as the present Territory of Oklahoma has for some time been qualified for statehood, which has been deferred until the Indian Territory should be ready to be joined therewith in statehood; and

Inasmuch as conditions in the Indian Territory imperatively demand some better form of government than now exists there; and

Inasmuch as Indian lands will be allotted in severalty before the time when statehood can go into effect as provided for in this bill, and for all the reasons set forth in this report, this committee report in favor of the joinder of the Territory of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory in one State, such State to be known as the State of Oklahoma.

To that end, and to the end that the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico may be joined in one State, to be known as the State of Arizona, this committee recommend that the bill do pass.

Views of the minority.

We do not agree with the conclusion of the majority, and dissent from the provisions of the bill creating one State from the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona for the following potent and manifest reasons:

The State created by joining New Mexico and Arizona will contain an area, in round numbers, of 235,500 square miles—vastly too large in this case for a safe and economical State government, even if no other objection could be urged. They are separated by the Continental Divide from their common northern boundary line to Mexico, a distance of 325 miles, every one of which lies through a rough, mountainous country.

There are only two practicable routes to cross these mountains east and west. The southern pass, near the thirty-second parallel, is used by the Southern Pacific and the El Paso and Southwestern railroads, which passes over an elevation of 4,000 feet. The northern pass is 25 miles north of the thirty-fifth parallel, where the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe crosses the line between the Territories at an altitude of nearly 7,000 feet. There is no crossing north of this point. Between the two passes mentioned lies a distance of 175 miles of rough mountains, over which there is no practicable passage from one Territory into the other. On the Arizona side of this line lies the counties of Graham and Apache, on the New Mexican side, and adjoining these counties, are Grant, Socorro, Valencia, and McKinley counties.

The main Continental Divide averages upward of 7,000 feet, with no practicable pass from the thirty-second to the thirty-fifth parallel. These mountains are great tilted blocks, with their precipitous faces to the west and long-sloping sides eastwardly. For any communication between these Territories, except along the lines of the railroads, as before described, the people must travel vast distances at great expense of time and money. This mighty mountain barrier between the two peoples makes their union an impossibility. It cuts off communication between them. The people of New Mexico in trade follow the course of their rivers to the east; Arizona's trade is almost entirely western. There is no more community of interest subsisting between these Territories than between Maine and Florida.

The rapid development of Arizona, her splendid civilization, and great growth in wealth and population furnish unanswerable proofs why a forced amalgamation of the people of the two commonwealths under one State government would be in the highest degree objectionable, unwise, and especially unfair to Arizona.

The area of New England, comprising six States, is about 65,000 square miles; the area of the Territory of Arizona is nearly twice greater, being 113,916 square miles.

The area of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, now proposed to be merged, is 235,117 square miles, or greater than Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Michigan, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and New Jersey.

The distance from one side of the proposed State to the other is as great as it is from New York to Chicago; it is 700 miles from the capital of Arizona to the capital of the proposed joint State at Santa Fe, N. Mex.; it is 900 miles from the county seat of the county of Yuma, Ariz., to Santa Fe, and the distances are comparatively as great from other populous communities in Arizona. For fully 250 miles in western New Mexico and eastern Arizona, along the two great lines of railroad which furnish the only practicable means of communication, the physical formation of the country is such as to forever prohibit sufficient population to maintain even county governments.

New Mexico and Arizona have their own public buildings, capitol, university, normal schools, asylum, penitentiary, etc., and all the necessary equipment for successful government.

Each Territory has a considerable bonded indebtedness, which would be difficult to adjust satisfactorily if the Territories were joined. The county, school district, and municipal indebtedness of Arizona is funded under authority of an act of Congress into low interest-bearing Territorial bonds which command a premium. Every subdivision of Arizona has first-class credit. No such funding law exists in New Mexico, and several of the counties there are insolvent, with a heavy and onerous indebtedness, evidenced by discredited securities which the owners hope the proposed joint State will assume.

It is impossible from the meager testimony before the committee to decide exactly the ratio of American as distinguished from the Spanish blood which makes up the population of New Mexico. The present Delegate reported the American as about 30, the Spanish or Mexican as about 70 per cent, but afterwards came before the committee and gave it as his opinion that they were about equally divided. We are making no objection to the Mexican population as such, but suggest the fact of a different language as a reason against uniting these Territories.

In Senate Report No. 2206, part 1, Fifty-seventh Congress, second session, made by Senator BEVERIDGE, it is asserted:

"The greater majority are native New Mexicans of Spanish and mixed Spanish and Indian descent, and these practically all speak Spanish in the affairs of daily life, and the majority speak nothing but Spanish.

"Courts are conducted through the medium of an interpreter, and it is impossible to conduct the machinery of justice without this official. (Testimony of Judge W. J. Mills, p. 2; Nepomuceno Segura, p. 4; William A. Gortner, p. 6; Judge McFie, p. 29; Judge Baker, p. 46; Judge McMillan, p. 110; Judge Parker, p. 96; Jose D. Sena, p. 31, and others.)

"The interpreter interprets the testimony of witnesses to the jury, the argument of counsel to the jury, and the charge of the court to the jury. (Testimony of witnesses above.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (SPANISH).

"Coming to the courts of the people—justices of the peace—practically all of them speak Spanish, and the proceedings of their courts are conducted in Spanish. The dockets of nearly all justices of the peace are kept almost exclusively in Spanish. The statutes of the Territory in the offices of practically all justices of the peace are printed in Spanish. (Testimony of Jesus Maria Tefoya, p. 12; Felipe Bacay Garcia, p. 26; Francisco Anaya, p. 39; Charles M. Conklin, p. 40; Jose Maria Garcia, p. 41; Juvenico Quintana, p. 42; Leonardo Duran, p. 43; Seferino Crollott, p. 52; Manuel Lopez, p. 98.)

POLITICAL CONVENTIONS AND SPEECHES BY INTERPRETER.

"In political campaings almost all political speeches are made either in Spanish or in English through an interpreter, and interpreters are used in practically all (it may even be said in all) political conventions. (Testimony of C. M. Foraker, p. 74; H. S. Wooster, p. 18; Felipe Bacay Garcia, p. 26, and others.)

"This is true even in the 'American' town of Albuquerque. (Testimony of C. M. Foraker, p. 74.)

"An interpreter was used in the last Republican Territorial convention which nominated the present Delegate to Congress, and nominating speeches were made through that medium. (Testimony of José D. Sena, p. 32.)

"An interpreter is used in the legislature, and both councils (senate and house) have official interpreters. (Testimony of José D. Sena, pp. 32–33.)"

This report, so far quoted, is not given as any argument against the people of New Mexico or as an argument against statehood for New Mexico, nor to detract in any way from the citizenship of that Territory, but to set forth such differences in the customs and language of the two Territories as show the folly and injustice of uniting them in one State. The minority is of the opinion from all that has been shown before the committee, and from what it can gather from former reports to Congress, and from the present Delegate and last ex-Delegate from New Mexico, that no one in either Territory is in favor of joint statehood, all preferring separate statehood for each Territory, and those now consenting to a joint State do so for fear of being indefinitely held under the yoke of Territorial vassalage.

Aside from these reasons, there is a moral if not legal objection to the union of Arizona with New Mexico or any other country whatever. The organic act, creating the Territory of Arizona, specifically provides:

"That said government (Arizona) shall be maintained and continued until such time as the people residing in said Territory shall * * * apply for and obtain admission as a State on an equal footing with the original States."

Under that guaranty the people of Arizona laid the foundation on which they have reared a great and prosperous Commonwealth. After the expenditure of millions of dollars in public improvements by the "people residing in said Territory"—after building roads, digging canals, erecting schoolhouses, churches, hospitals, asylums, colleges, and court-houses in every county; after having by heavy taxation of themselves put into smooth and active operation every enginery of a proud State—to now condemn them against their will to hand all these things over to the management of the superior number of people residing in New Mexico, and with whom they have nothing in common, is a direct violation of good faith on the part of Congress, and can not be justified in either morals or statesmanship. There is not even the excuse of political exigency.

Against the proposed jointure of Arizona and New Mexico every protest that any people could make has been made to Congress by both Territories. Their wishes should be respected. We are of opinion that such union can bring nothing but disaster to both Territories. The governor of New Mexico, in his report to the Secretary of the Interior for 1902 (p. 4), shows 8 Spanish-Americans to 5 of all other races combined. The roster of every legislature save one proves the predominance of Spanish-Americans in New Mexico.

Governor Otero, of New Mexico, in a protest against joining Arizona and New Mexico, said:

"Our objection is not due to any innate animosity between the two Territories, but to the inherent differences in population, in legislation, in industries, in contour, in ideals, and from an historical and ethnologic standpoint, not to mention that the consolidation of two Commonwealths like New Mexico and Arizona into one is unprecedented in American history.

"The new State would be an unnatural and unwilling alliance. It would be the coercion of two populations which are unlike in character, in ambition, and largely in occupation. The union would be abhorrent to both. Simply because the two populations are in the Southwest, the country should not suppose that they are alike or sympathetic."

Hundreds of protests from the people of Arizona confirm this statement of the governor. (Some of these protests will appear in the appendix hereto.)

There are many conflicts between the laws of the two Territories which can never be reconciled. All Latin races are influenced by civil law. In Arizona there is no suggestion of civil-law ideas. Inheritance laws differ radically from those of New Mexico. Irrigation laws have been made to meet Arizona's peculiar conditions. Any change would necessarily seriously disturb vested rights. The readjustment of taxes and public debts would be a source of constant disagreement, if, indeed, they could ever be adjusted at all. A further great injustice is done in the bill by forcing Arizona to contribute her share to the payment of the debts of New Mexico—debts in the creation of which she had no voice and in which she had no interest whatever and from which she received no benefit directly or indirectly.

If the governor's report be true, the Spanish-American population of New Mexico is greater than the entire American population of Arizona. The latter has only a small percentage of citizens of Spanish descent, and nearly all of them speak the English language, and their children attend the public schools and are living in perfect harmony with their surroundings and aiding through splendid citizenship the upbuilding of the Territory. The English language is the universal language of Arizona. The Spanish is the dominant language of New Mexico. The people of New Mexico are a homogeneous people. The races by the contact of years have broken down prejudices, and there is no objection to the admission of that Territory as a single State.

But we fear that the union of these two Territories against the wish of either will awaken in each the strongest of race and religious prejudices which will retard for half a century the onward march of both. Strife, crime, injustice will result, and the poor and uneducated will be the chief sufferers. We can see no excuse or justification for forcing a distasteful union between two Territories different in customs, aspirations, hopes, ideals, purposes, and language; divided by an almost impassable mountain barrier, which has made and will forever keep them strangers to each other.

Oklahoma and Indian Territory are entitled to separate statehood, and we prefer that each should be admitted as a State, but being convinced that the people of the Indian Territory prefer one State with Oklahoma, rather than no State, the minority reluctantly consent to vote for the measure if Arizona and New Mexico are struck from the bill.

The Republicans of the House and Senate defeated the Oklahoma statehood bill in the last Congress by the very tactics which they are now using to defeat it. There is no more reason to join Arizona and New Mexico to the Oklahoma statehood bill than there is in joining in the same measure the Territories of Alaska and Porto Rico.

The manifest purpose of the majority is to unjustly keep Oklahoma out of the Union unless they can with greater injustice force Arizona in.

We regret that we can not support the present measure on account of the unwillingness of the majority to permit the Territories a separate vote on the question of the union of Arizona and New Mexico. For the same reason we would support the bill for the union of Oklahoma and Indian Territory we oppose the part of the bill uniting Arizona and New Mexico as contrary to the will of the people residing therein.

Voicing, as we believe, the unanimous sentiment of the Democratic side of the House, and to exhibit to the people of these Territories the Democratic position on this question, the minority in the committee offered the following amendment to the bill, fearing that no amendment would be permitted to be offered when the bill reached the House. The amendment was as follows:

"Strike out all of the bill which relates to Arizona and New Mexico, so as to leave it a bill for the admission of Oklahoma and Indian Territory as one State."

The roll being called, every Democrat on the committee voted "Aye," and every Republican voted "No."

The minority then moved to "amend the bill by striking out every provision relating to Arizona," so that Oklahoma and Indian Territory could come in as one State and New Mexico as one State.

The question being put and the roll called, every Democrat voted "Aye." Every Republican voted "No."

The minority then moved to insert the words "each of" on page 45, line 1, between the words "Territories" and "voting," so that the constitution of the State of Arizona should not be adopted unless a majority of the people in each of said Territories should separately vote in favor thereof, and declared their willingness to support the bill as a whole if so amended. The question being put, every Republican present voted "No," and every Democrat present voted "Aye."

We deplore the President's action in recommending without assigning reasons for joint statehood for Arizona and New Mexico, and thus ignoring the last expression of the Republican national platform on the question of statehood for the remaining Territories. The Republican party in 1896 had this plank in its platform:

"We favor the admission of the remaining Territories at the earliest practicable date, having due regard for the interest of the people of the Territories and of the United States."

The same party in 1900 had this declaration:

"We favor home rule for, and the early admission to statehood of, the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and Oklahoma."

These pledges are plainly violated in the failure to report a bill in favor of statehood for each of these Territories. Such a bill passed the House of Representatives in the Fifty-seventh Congress, and each of them certainly has a much stronger claim for recognition now than it had in 1902, when the statehood bill passed. The Delegate from Arizona, near the beginning of that session, presented a bill for the admission of Arizona as a State. The Delegate from New Mexico presented a similar bill for the admission of New Mexico, and the Delegate from Oklahoma likewise presented a bill asking for the admission of Oklahoma to statehood, and in the hearings before the committee each of them insisted that the bill presented by him reflected the wishes of his people and insisted upon a favorable report thereon.

The people of Arizona and New Mexico especially have repudiated the action of the committee in trying to make joint statehood for their Territories. Why should the Committee on the Territories change its base with reference to this matter? What excuse can be given to the country for this utter disregard of party pledges and failure to consider the wishes of the people?

Under this bill Arizona, being numerically the weaker, could be forced into a union with New Mexico, even though every vote in Arizona were cast against the consolidation. The stronger of the two Territories can mercilessly coerce the other into union.

It has long been a settled doctrine of American polity, founded in wisdom and justice, that a Territory of the Union is, upon organization, clothed with the inchoate right of ultimate statehood—a right to be exercised in the discretion of Congress when the Territory is capable, by reason of its resources and population, to assume the duties and obligations of a free State.

The denial of this right, the reversal of this policy by an arbitrary exercise of power by Congress in forcing an unnatural union of Territories against the will of their people, the forcible union of peoples distinct in customs, habits, manners, and religion, is ultraradical and revolutionary. It is a pitiful illustration of the degradation to which a party may fall when violating, for party purposes, its plighted faith made to the people in the national platform.

Should the Republican party pass this bill, wicked as it is in the denial of equal rights in representation and partisan in all of its material details, it will but afford another indecent example of the suppression of individual, Territorial, and national rights to subserve partisan ends.

No ultimate good can come to any political party or to our common country by tyrannizing any part of it. Arizona should have the right to say whether she will or will not accept this bill. Her people are neither aliens nor strangers. Her citizenship is composed of the best fiber from every State in the Union. They have built a great commonwealth of which they are justly proud. They desire to preserve it intact. It is their right. This bill is viewed by them as oppressive, tyrannous, and vindictive. Over their protest it should not be passed. For the best interest of Arizona and New Mexico alike, and for the best interest of our common country as well, we protest against the passage of this or any bill uniting these two Territories for all time in a union obnoxious to either.

We herewith present an appendix showing that Arizona and New Mexico are each entitled to separate statehood, and also setting forth some of the protests reaching Congress against joining the two as proposed by the present bill.

Respectfully submitted.

APPENDIX No. 1.

Protests to Congress against the passage of the joint State bill for New Mexico and Arizona.

These protests are all to the same purpose, and we will present in full only one or two and refer by title to some of the others.

The following resolutions were adopted unanimously at the convention held May 27, 1905, at Phoenix, to organize an antijoint statehood league:

"RESOLUTIONS.

"We, the members of the antijoint statehood convention, chosen from every political subdivision and representing the people of the Territory of Arizona, in convention assembled, do hereby declare:

"Whereas we have reasons to fear that at the coming session of Congress an attempt will be made to enact a law providing for the admission into the Union jointly, as one State, of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico; and

"Whereas we have been authorized and directed by the people of Arizona to give an expression of their views in regard to such proposed union: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the people of Arizona are unalterably opposed to the union of Arizona with New Mexico.

"And on their behalf we do earnestly protest against the enactment of the proposed measure by the Congress of the United States, or of any measure which has for its purpose the admission of Arizona into the Union as a part of any other State or Territory.

"And, believing that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, we urge the Congress to heed this expression of the sentiments of our people on this question and to listen to some of the reasons why we will never consent to the proposed union.

"Our people feel a just pride in their history, prosperity, development, and high civilization, and confidently look to the future for the realization, through the development of our wonderful resources and by reason of the splendid energy and character of our citizenship, of a still higher civilization and more general prosperity, and to the time, near at hand, when our qualifications, by reason of our wealth, population, and development, to single statehood must be recognized by the whole people of America.

"We entertain for the people of our sister Territory, New Mexico, the kindliest feelings and sympathize with them in their efforts for admission as a State of the Union. Yet we profoundly believe that the union of the two Territories as one State would be inimical to the best and highest interests of the people of both, and because of the differences in our history, laws, customs, and races, and because of the geographical divisions which naturally separate and divide us such union would be particularly harmful to the people of Arizona.

"We believe that the complications which would inevitably result from an attempt to adjust impartially the burdens of the debts of the Territories and of the various counties and municipalities thereof would result in irreconcilable differences, and that the prosperity and welfare of the various Territorial institutions—educational, eleemosynary, and reformatory—would be endangered and their usefulness destroyed.

"We further believe that it would be impossible to adopt such a code of laws as would meet the conditions in each Territory, and yet which would be just to the whole people of the proposed State. We further represent that political autonomy is the dearest wish and hope of our people, and the stimulus of much of our work, labor, and effort in establishing institutions which have for their object the education of our children and the care and maintenance of the unfortunate, in the improvement and growth of our material interests, and in the development of our distinctive type of civilization; and that the loss of this autonomy would destroy our hope, discourage effort, confuse our purposes for the future, retard our development, and permanently injure us as a people.

"To be compelled against our will and desire to lose our identity, and to be merged into the proposed State in which we would have so little voice, wounds our pride and violates our sense of justice and fairness.

"Therefore, as patriotic and law-abiding people, we confidently appeal to the Congress of the United States to avert the disaster that threatens us, and rather than force upon us this proposed union to allow us to remain a Territory indefinitely."

The serious and dignified language of that manly protest should, with Congress, outweigh the unexplained and terse recommendation of the President on a question and a condition of which he can not possibly be as well informed as they and in which he can not possibly have a more patriotic or the same absorbing interest.

Without setting out the language of the various protests against this measure, we content ourselves by naming a few of the many which have been presented, to wit:

The memorial of the Arizona legislature.

General Sampson obtained in Phoenix 1,200 names of protestants against the bill, and, keeping strict count and making no discrimination, reports that only 7 persons refused to sign.
Also, protest of Ministers' Conference, Phoenix, January 19.
Protest of the town of Tempe and many others too numerous to mention.

The governor of Arizona, in his last report just made to the Secretary of the Interior, says:

"Arizona is well qualified for self-government, but, although entitled to separate statehood, she is not seeking it, and only asks to be let alone at this time, and not be forced into a miserable merger where her splendid identity will be lost, and where she will be outvoted and dominated in every official way by a population not in sympathy with her institutions or her people. The citizens of Arizona also believe that their feelings and wishes in the premises are entitled to some consideration, and every board of trade, municipal and county government, Territorial bar, and banking association, with public institutions, educational and church, the organization of both political parties, the Territorial legislature, and the people of every town and hamlet have earnestly protested against what they believe would be an irreparable wrong."

Both Territorial conventions nominating candidates for Congress put a plank in their platform against joint statehood with New Mexico. The same was done in New Mexico, and the last legislative assembly of New Mexico in a joint resolution memorialized Congress against joint statehood.

Resources of Arizona.

It has been argued in Congress that only 1 per cent of the area of Arizona is suitable for cultivation. Arizona is so large that even if this were true—and it is not—this area would be greater in extent than the State of Rhode Island.

In 1905 there were 11,257,385 acres of land located and taxed; 13,854,615 acres of grazing land on the public domain; 26,089,600 acres in Indian and forest reserves. The balance of the Territory, consisting of 21,067,200 acres of mountainous or desert land, can never be reclaimed, but much of it is rich in minerals.

There are 520,000 acres of land which will be adequately supplied with water by the irrigation projects now in contemplation or under construction by the Federal Government.

Mr. F. H. Newell, United States Geological Survey, is authority for the statement that there are 800,000 acres in Arizona which can be reclaimed by irrigation. In the Salt River Valley alone there are 200,000 acres which will be supplied with water within two years by the Tonto reservoir, which is now under construction.

The area of this valley is equal to all of the irrigated land in southern California north as far as Santa Barbara, which supports Los Angeles and many other large cities.

The pine forests of Arizona cover an area of over 12,000 square miles. The San Francisco Forest Reserve contains 1,939,640 acres. The Black Mesa 1,782,040, which, combined with the other smaller reserves, bring up the total acreage to nearly 7,500,000. (Dept. of Int. U. S. Geol. Surv. Papers 22 and 23.) In the Black Mesa there is now standing 4,081,498,000 feet B. M., with an average market value of $122,444,494. In the San Francisco Reserve 812,500 acres, or less than one-half, has been examined and measured. This shows 2,743,558,000 feet—market value, $82,306,740.

A safe estimate of the value of Government timber in Arizona is $300,000,000 when marketed.

We are informed by the Agricultural Department that with the introduction of new forage grasses our grazing land can be greatly extended and improved. New methods of cultivation without irrigation are being successfully tried in the Panhandle district in Texas, in Colorado, and in Utah, which conclusively show that a large part of our semiarid land, situated where irrigation is impossible, will eventually be profitably cultivated. It was only a few years ago that Kansas was considered a barren waste.

The census of 1900 gives Arizona 113 producing mines in operation, and 381 mines in process of development. On January 1 of that year the records show that altogether 1,085 patents and applications for patents had been filed in the land offices.

On November 15, 1905, the records show 1,620 patents and applications, 50 per cent more than all that had been applied for previous to 1900.

The total yield so far as can be shown by data from 1870 to 1894, of gold, silver, and copper, is $156,368,620.70. (Table 203, Mines and Quarries.) During the decade ending in 1904 the production of gold and silver amounted to $55,343,683, notwithstanding the great depreciation in the price of silver. The production of copper during this decade increased 300 per cent and amounted to $119,566,688.

These earlier figures are based on the reports of the commissioner of mines and Wells-Fargo Express Company, which transported most of the output. The latter figures are from reports of directors of the mints.

During the last two or three years railroad construction has opened up new districts; the Prescott and Eastern Railway, the Arizona and Eastern Railway, and the Phoenix and Eastern Railway run into the heart of rich mineralized regions where mining has previously been impracticable. Official figures are not available, but it is common knowledge that the output of our mines has doubled in three years, and that Arizona, now second in the production of copper, will step ahead of Montana in 1906 and take first place. When it is realized that this product comes from mines that can be counted on one hand, it is vain to predict the possibilities of the future.

The mineral belt of this Territory is one of the largest in the world. It reaches from Nevada and Utah in the northwest, passing diagonally through the Territory into the State of Sonora, Mexico, in the southeast, a distance in length of 437 miles by about 100 miles in width.

The grazing belt extends from the line of New Mexico on the east to the timber belt, 140 miles west. The timber belt is a vast area of great pine forests, containing nearly 10,000 square miles of as fine timber as there is in the world.

MANUFACTURING.

Manufacturing, except the smelting of ores, is nearly all a thing of the future, but with our swift mountain streams to develop power it will come as it does in all well-settled countries. The streams available for power are: Upper Gila River, San Francisco River, Little Colorado River, Verde River, Concho River, Nutrioso River, Virgin River, Bill Williams Fork, White River, Salt River. Five thousand horsepower has already been developed on the Salt at the Tonto dam site.

With this showing of resources that can and will be developed, we submit it is unnecessary to force the people of Arizona into this distasteful and indissoluble union with New Mexico.

With such a showing as this in our undeveloped resources, in agricultural lands, grazing lands, forests and mines, has any man the right to say that Arizona will not, even within ten years' time, rank well up in the list of States and Territories in her developed resources and, as a result, in population?

AGRICULTURE.

In 1870 there were only 172 farms in Arizona, containing 21,807 acres, of which 66.9 were improved and had a valuation, with live stock, of $325,441. (12th Census, pp. 142–144, Vol. V.) This was only thirty-five years ago.

With the advent of railroads and the disappearance of hostile Indians we find in 1880 there were 767 farms, an increase during the decade of 345.9 per cent, having a total acreage of 135,576, an increase of 521.7 per cent, with valuations aggregating $2,384,746, an increase of 632.8 per cent. (12th Census, pp. 688–693, Vol. V.)

In 1890 the farms had increased to 1,426 in number, or 85.9 per cent, the acreage to 1,297,033, or 856.7 per cent, while the valuations amounted to $10,676,470, a gain of 347.7 per cent. The individual holdings during this decade averaged 910 acres to the farm and only 8 per cent was improved.

In 1900 the number of farms was increased to 5,809, the acreage per farm reduced to an average of 333, the valuations increased to $29,906,877, an increase of 161.9 per cent, and even then only 13.2 per cent was improved. (12th Census, pp. 696, Vol. V.)

The total value of crops for the year 1899 (the last year in the census reports) was $6,997,097. Live stock, $15,375,286, of which $2,908,745 worth were sold for export; $296,013 were consumed in the Territory. The total farm products for the year amounted to $10,201,855, an average of $1,739 per farm, or $60.70 per acre of cultivated lands. A portion of this profit should be attributed to grazing lands belonging to the Federal Government, but all range cattle are fattened for market in the valleys that are irrigated.

This summary of the increased production is an answer to the argument that Arizona has not advanced "in three hundred years."

The following table will show the productiveness of Arizona soil for a period of ten years (Yearbook, issued by Department of Agriculture):

Wheat.—Arizona: Average bushels per acre, 21.5; value per acre, $17.47; value per bushel, 81.2 cents. United States: Average bushels per acre, 13.4; value per acre, $8.66; value per bushel, 64.6 cents.

Corn.—Arizona: Average bushels per acre, 28.8; value per acre, $22.17; value per bushel, 77 cents. United States: Average bushels per acre, 24.7; value per acre, $10.02; value per bushel, 40.3 cents.

Oats.—Arizona: Average bushels per acre, 34; value per acre, $22.14; value per bushel, 65.1 cents. United States: Average bushels per acre, 28.7; value per acre, $7.70; value per bushel, 26.8 cents.

Hay.—Arizona: Average tons per acre, 2.63; value per acre, $27.28; value per ton, $10.37. United States: Average tons per acre, 1.37; value per acre, $10.89; value per ton, $7.87.

Special crops under high culture produce remarkable results. The following are a few well-authenticated recent instances taken from the Salt River Valley:

Mr. J. W. Toumey, of Glendale, has produced 15 tons of alfalfa to the acre in one year which sells in the stack for $5 a ton.

Mr. J. W. Black, near Phoenix, realized $1,200 per acre of strawberries on a large crop from May to December.

The cantaloupe crop yields from 150 to 200 crates per acre, and due to the early market nets the skillful farmer from $200 to $500 per acre.

Mr. A. G. Bailey raised 8,249 pounds of peaches from 1 acre, which he sold on the spot for $412.45.

The figures on citrus fruits are even greater, but, of course, they require more time to come into bearing.

Thirty and three-tenths per cent of the population of Arizona are engaged in farming, as compared with 35.6 for the United States. Eighty-four and one-tenth per cent of the farmers own their homes with only 5.4 per cent mortgaged. The average in the United States is 44.4 per cent own homes and 20 per cent are mortgaged.

In 1900 there were in Arizona 519 irrigating canals completed aggregating 1,492 miles, costing $4,408,158, serving 185,396 acres of land. In 1902 there were 781 canals, an increase in two years of over 50 per cent, serving an acreage of 247,250. (Irrigation Bulletin No. 16, 1903.)

The Copper Handbook (Stevens) estimates the production in Arizona for 1903 at 150,000,000 pounds.

The same authority places that for 1904 at 230,000,000 pounds, based upon production of the larger properties.

Output 1905 is 241,400,000 pounds.

RESOURCES OF NEW MEXICO.

New Mexico is likewise prepared for single statehood, as the following statement of her resources will show. But as no hearings have been had before the committee at this session of Congress touching the resources in New Mexico, the minority presents the facts reported by the minority of the committee in the last Congress.

New Mexico was acquired from the Republic of Mexico by the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo February 2, 1848, and by the Gadsden purchase of December 30, 1853.

It is 360 miles north and south by 346 miles east and west, and contains 122,580 square miles, or 78,451,200 acres, on which, by the census of 1900, live a population of 195,310, being 1.6 persons to the square mile.

As in the case of Arizona, the census is claimed to be inaccurate, and the Delegate from New Mexico claims a population of not less than 350,000.

FARMS AND FARM PRODUCTS.

Number of farms, 1890, 4,458; in 1900, 11,834. Acres in farms in 1890, 787,882; in 1900, 5,130,878. Value of farms in 1890, $33,543,141; in 1900, $53,737,824. Value of farm lands, 1890, $8,140,800; 1900, $20,888,824. Value of farm implements, 1890, $291,240; 1900, $1,151,610. Value of live stock, 1890, $25,111,201; 1900, $31,727,400. Value of farm products, 1890, $2,000,000; 1900, $10,000,000. Acres in alfalfa, 1890, 12,139; 1900, 55,467. Acres under culture, 1890, 91,745; 1900, 203,893. Butter, 1890, 105,000 pounds; 1900, 381,000. Eggs, 1890, 280,000 dozen; 1900, 840,000 dozen. Hay, census of 1900, $1,427,317. Cereals, 1900, $979,903. Vegetables, 1900, $278,413. Acres under irrigation, 326,873. Improved farms, 1900, 12,311. Farms under irrigation, 9,128. Value of irrigated farms, $13,551,592. Value of nonirrigated farms, $3,773,177.

The above statistics do not take into consideration the lands cultivated by the Indians, the Pueblos being farmers and great producers of crops; nor of crops raised on farms of less than 3 acres, of which there are many thousands in New Mexico.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Subject to entry under the Federal land laws on June 30, 1903, 52,000,000 acres. This does not include the production by individual placer miners or by prospectors not mining in a systematic manner. In addition, New Mexico produced a vast quantity of coal, iron, turquoise, gypsum, building material, and a number of other useful minerals and precious stones. The Colorado Fuel and Iron Company during the fiscal year hauled 138,152 long tons of iron ore out of New Mexico. Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the controversy between the two parties in this House on the admission of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico and Oklahoma and Indian Territory as States has been very intense for some years past. The Democratic party, or its representatives in this body, have felt that it was to the interest of all the people of the United States that the balance of power in this Government between the sections should be preserved in the Federal Senate by the admission of four States, and have opposed the consolidation of these four Territories into two States. But in the consideration of the case of Oklahoma and Indian Territory, we were confronted with the principle that has always been sacred to the Democratic party—the demand of the people of these two Territories for joint statehood. Yielding our own views in order that the voice of the people might be obeyed, the minority of the Committee on Territories readily acceded to the proposition of the majority for the union of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory. For the very same reasons that we agreed to the union of these two Territories we have opposed the union of Arizona and New Mexico, because it was apparent to us that the people of those Territories did not desire union, and we felt that it was against the principles of good government, against the cherished theories of both parties, to force an unwelcome union upon these two Territories. [Applause.] We yield to the will of the people in both instances and sustain the principles of free institutions. We saw this House by a large majority vote us down, as the majority of the committee had done. Again, in conference, after the bill came from the Senate, we saw the contention of the House sustained by a majority of the conferees, and then, Mr. Speaker, we witnessed that which seldom has occurred in this or any other body.

The reports that had been made to the two Houses by the majority of the managers of both Houses were quietly withdrawn from the two bodies, and again the matter went into conference. In the meantime there had been a consultation on the part of the Republican majority of the House and Senate on the situation. The result at the next meeting was the agreement to the report that is now before the House for consideration—a unanimous agreement. Strange to say, it embodies the very principles for which the Democracy has contended for six long years in this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is not for me to say what induced the majority, having the power to pass a bill of another character, to yield to the will of the minority. Shall we attribute it to political exigencies, or to the high sense of justice which the majority at last reached, in accordance with the views of the minority?

Mr. Speaker, there is nothing more to be said on this question. We are ready to vote. We unite with the majority in asking the adoption of the unanimous report of this committee, that the great people of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory may assume the powers of a sovereign State and come under the folds of the flag and the protection of the Constitution, and that the people of Arizona and New Mexico, in accordance with the long-established doctrine of a free people, shall, by their own voice, determine whether they shall enter the Union as States or remain as Territories of the Republic. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, three times through the House of Representatives, twice Democratic and once Republican, and in a Republican House having the support of several Members now on this Territorial Committee, we have succeeded in passing bills for the creation of separate States out of New Mexico and Arizona. Born somewhere of a parentage of which it should be ashamed, a bill was brought into this House absolutely closing the mouth of every man in Arizona, a country for which those pioneers for forty-five years had fought, and alas, too many of them had died. Arizona was to be put at the mercy of New Mexico, and under the bill reported to this House we were to hold a constitutional convention, composed of delegates from each Territory. Whether we wanted it or not, we were to form a constitution and submit it to the people, both Territories voting as one on its adoption, and there should be a nomination of State officers and of the legislature, which should elect Senators, and in that we were to vote as a unit, and if every man in Arizona had voted against it, we would have been compelled to submit, provided two-thirds of the other Territory wanted it. Against that we on the Democratic side have stood as one man; and, thank God, there was also a united, though small, band of Republicans—alleged insurgents of to-day—the patriots of to-morrow—by their patriotic resistence of all blandishments called the attention of the world to the outrage that this House was attempting to perpetrate against the unoffending people of the West. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The less said about the way this original bill has been pressed the better for the history of this Congress, and I refrain from going into that part of it. There is a law in Arizona that if one legislator trades with another on the legislation before that body he is guilty of a very high misdemeanor, and if the governor shall attempt in that benighted land to influence legislation by promises of veto or the withholding of veto to secure other legislation he goes to the penitentiary under the laws of that land.

I congratulate my people, and in their name I thank this side of the House, and doubly in their name do I thank that brave, honest, and incorruptible band of Republican "insurgents" who, by exercise of justice in statesmanship, have shed glory on their names and gratified the honest constituency who gave them their high place in this august body. When I consider all that beset our path in this long and cruel fight, I congratulate Arizona that she at least shall say whether she will or will not be forced into an obnoxious union. For this we fought, and the battle has been won. At the next session of this Congress, when the returns from that election shall be known, we will hear no more of joint statehood for these Territories. The five million bribe put in this bill will not seduce the manhood of our people from their duty to their country, as it will show at the coming election by such a majority that this monstrous wrong will never again be attempted on the floor of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Michigan to yield to me for five minutes.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois for five minutes. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, as a Member of the House of Representatives during this session, as at all other sessions, I have represented my constituency and acted for the whole people according to my best judgment. The coming into the Union of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory meets my approval. If I had my choice and were supreme I would infinitely prefer to see Oklahoma and the Indian Territory come separately, with an aggregate population of almost one and one-half millions, with four Senators, rather than to see New Mexico and Arizona come together, and God knows, rather than to see them come singly, with less than 300,000 population, with four Senators. It is not a secret as to my views as a Representative. I have sought to the best of my ability to voice my views. You have the result before you. Although every man in the Indian Territory should vote against statehood for the new proposed State of Oklahoma, notwithstanding that protest the State would be and will be formed under this enabling act.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona rose.

Mr. CANNON. I do not yield at this moment. There is no separate vote there. There is a separate vote, however, as to the other—Arizona and New Mexico. So much for that. I do not propose to go into the merits of this proposition at this time. I would not have taken the floor had not the honorable gentleman, the Delegate from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], made the remark that there was a high penalty for the governor of that Territory to attempt to influence legislation, or for one legislative body or its membership to attempt to traffic in legislation with the other, in order to secure certain other legislation, if I correctly state him.

That remark could not have had but one motive and one meaning, and that meaning is that some one in the House has sought to affect legislation in the House as a matter of traffic in order to secure action upon this matter in the Senate or in the House. That imputation implied, so far as it reflects upon the Speaker of this House and, so far as I know or believe, upon any other Member of this House, is unworthy of the gentleman that uttered it and without foundation in fact. [Loud applause.] If it were necessary to furnish proof of this statement, I look about me here on my own side of the House on Members with whom I disagreed touching the progress of this bill from time to time, and upon that side of the House, and I pause and invite any Member present who has the least intimation, knowledge, or even belief that the statement implied in the insinuation of the gentleman is true to so state. [Loud and long-continued applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] moves the previous question.

The question was taken; and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and the conference report was agreed to. [Loud and long-continued applause.]

On motion of Mr. HAMILTON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF PUBLIC LAND LAWS.

Mr. SMOOT. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12323) to extend the public land laws of the United States to the lands comprised within the limits of the abandoned Fort Crittenden Military Reservation, in the State of Utah, to report it favorably, without amendment, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. A bill of like import has passed the Senate, and I desire to offer it as an amendment to the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota offers an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add as an additional section to the bill the following:

SEC. 2. That all persons now having or who may hereafter file homestead applications upon any of the lands situate within the abandoned Fort Rice Military Reservation, in the State of North Dakota, shall be entitled to a patent to the land filed upon by such person upon compliance with the provisions of the homestead law of the United States and proper proof thereof, and shall not be required to pay the appraised values of such lands in addition to such compliance with the said homestead law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to extend the public land laws of the United States to the lands comprised within the limits of the abandoned Fort Crittenden Military Reservation, in the State of Utah, and for other purposes."

EVERGLADES OF FLORIDA.

Mr. FRAZIER. I am directed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 65) directing the Secretary of Agriculture to cause a survey of the Everglades of Florida to determine the feasibility and cost of draining said Everglades, and for other purposes, to report it favorably with an amendment.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be read.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read for information.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a survey of the Everglades of Florida to be made, with a view to ascertaining and determining the feasibility and probable cost of reclaiming and draining said Everglades for agricultural purposes, and also to cause an examination of the soil in said Everglades with a view to determining its quality and adaptability and probable productiveness when reclaimed and devoted to agricultural purposes.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $10,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying out the requirements of this resolution, and that said sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be reserved from the sales of public lands in the State of Florida and paid into the Treasury of the United States in lieu of any portion of the $10,000 hereby appropriated for the purposes designated by this resolution.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Agriculture report to Congress at as early a day as possible the result of said surveys, with such recommendations as he may think proper to make.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Florida a question concerning this matter. How extensive in area are the so-called "Everglades" of Florida?

Mr. MALLORY. They have never been surveyed. My estimate is that there are about 2,000,000 acres.

Mr. GALLINGER. How much does the Senator think it would cost the Government to drain those 2,000,000 acres?

Mr. MALLORY. This measure does not propose that the Government shall drain it, but simply to ascertain whether it is feasible for drainage. The Everglades are subject to overflow from Lake Okeechobee. Lake Okeechobee is a large lake, some 40 miles long and 40 miles wide. It overflows annually and floods the Everglades and makes them uninhabitable. Whether the lands are drainable or can be reclaimed is a mooted question, and it has not been settled. The authorities of the State of Florida have been considering it for some time, and they are contemplating making an effort to drain them; but there really has been no survey made and nothing to determine that the project is feasible.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if it is not safe to assume that if the Government determines that this is a feasible scheme, an appropriation will be asked for that purpose?

Mr. MALLORY. I do not think so, for this reason: I think that ultimately the lands will go to the State of Florida. I think they would go to the State of Florida now if they had been surveyed, but they have not been surveyed, and of course can not go, under the circumstances.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have asked these questions for the reason that there is not a State in the Union, great or small, that has not swamp lands which it would be desirable to drain and make good agricultural lands if it could be brought about in that way.

I notice a disposition to divert a portion of the irrigation fund to purposes of drainage. In other words, we passed a law to procure water for agricultural purposes, and now we are asked to divert a part of that fund for the purpose of getting rid of water.

Mr. MALLORY. Unfortunately we in Florida are situated exactly in the opposite position from what they are in the West.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I know that.

Mr. MALLORY. But the principle is the same. We only propose to use money received from the sale of public lands in the State of Florida for this purpose, not for the purpose of draining the land, but to ascertain whether it is drainable. If the question should come up hereafter, and the Government is asked to pay, the Senator would possibly object to it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I presume the Senator from New Hampshire refers to the bill which passed the Senate recently providing for the setting aside of $1,000,000 of moneys arising from the sale of public lands in the State of North Dakota to be used for the purpose of drainage. I will ask the Senator if he can find any constitutional distinction between the irrigation law, which provides for putting water on land, and any drainage bill which provides for taking water off of land?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am not going to enter into a constitutional argument on this question. I merely want to say that if we are to stand by the irrigation project, which every eastern Senator voted for and which I believe to be a good thing, and if we are now to go into the matter of draining all the swamp lands of the West and the South, of course, Senators representing the northern country will ask that their swamps shall be drained. It is to my mind a very serious matter that we are entering upon a scheme of legislation which will become exceedingly troublesome in the future.

I am not going to object to the consideration of the joint resolution, but I wanted this information before it was voted on, because I want to give notice that if this is to be policy, we have not any lands in the North which need irrigation that I am aware of, but we have a great many thousands of acres of land that need drainage, and we are going to get into that game, if it is to be the policy of the Government.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Are there any Government lands in the Senator's State?

Mr. GALLINGER. No, sir.

Mr. BACON. These are Government lands.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator whether the Everglades of Florida are Government lands? I think they are not.

Mr. MALLORY. As I have stated, they will ultimately go to the State, but they have never been surveyed.

Mr. GALLINGER. But they are not now Government lands. So the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia does not apply to the Everglades of Florida.

Mr. BACON. I understand the Senator to say that ultimately they will go to the State, but that they are now the property of the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. Ultimately we would like to sell our swamps to the Government.

Mr. BACON. The title is now in the United States Government.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that there are a good many swamps up and down the Atlantic coast, some in New England, some in Louisiana, Mississippi, and elsewhere—South Carolina has some—and when those of us who have swamps see the beneficence of this Government expended in putting water by irrigation on arid lands and in draining, as the Senator from North Dakota obtained the passage of a bill through the Senate—I do not know what was done with it in the House—to take water off of land in his State, I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire that if this kind of cake is to be served out I will want my piece of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I crave the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments, that I may explain the bill which passed this body some two months ago. I do not propose to interfere with the Senator's joint resolution, and I will not object to its consideration, of course.

The situation in North Dakota is this: That State has put into the reclamation fund up to date about $5,000,000. It will be impossible for us to expend there for irrigation more than $500,000. In the eastern part of my State, in the great Red River Valley, there are a million acres of land to-day under water, the result of excessive rainfall. That has been the condition in that section for the last seven or eight years.

So, Mr. President, it occurred to me at the opening of the present session that it would be a good idea if North Dakota might be allowed to use a portion of the money arising from the sale of public lands within that State to drain the water off of land in the Red River Valley, and that was the nature of the bill which was passed by the Senate and is now in the House of Representatives.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. I desire to ask the Senator from North Dakota if the lands that would be drained under the bill he introduced, which has passed the Senate, and which I understand has been favorably reported from the House committee to that body, would be private lands—lands belonging to individuals—or would public lands only be drained?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Both private and public, but the larger portion of the lands are in private ownership. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that there is not an irrigation project to-day contemplated by the Reclamation Service that is not largely composed of private lands. So there can be no distinction, it seems to me, in that respect.

Mr. STONE. I should like to say, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. I voted for the bill and approved of it, and I do yet. I think there is no more reason why money should be expended to reclaim lands by putting water on them, than it should be expended to reclaim them by taking water off. I agree to that. We have in my State the St. Francis River, which runs through the southeastern part of Missouri and the northeastern part of Arkansas and empties into the Mississippi River. Along the St. Francis River in the State of Missouri alone there are 6,000 square miles of as fertile land as can be found on earth, largely covered by water. A movement is now on foot among the people in that part of Missouri and in that part of Arkansas to secure Congressional action looking to the reclamation of those lands.

Mr. TILLMAN. Are those the lands that were submerged by the New Madrid earthquake?

Mr. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thought so.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I want to say on this general question of drainage, that so far as I am concerned I would be very glad to favor any proposition which would relieve the situation in any of the States of the Union, whether it be in New Hampshire, or Missouri, or Arkansas, or South Carolina, or elsewhere, with respect to drainage, and I believe it is proper for this Government to favor an enterprise of that kind.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I understand the Senator——
Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President——
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Michigan?
Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.
Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, it is apparent that this matter is of such moment as to consume much time in debate if it is considered now. This is entering upon a new field of legislation, it seems to me, and if this policy is to be entered upon, we have a large quantity of land in my State that we will want to have drained by the Government of the United States.
Mr. HANSBROUGH. I would favor including Michigan in the list of States to be benefited by it.
Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I object to the present consideration of the joint resolution.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the joint resolution goes to the Calendar.
Mr. HALE. Let it go to the Calendar under Rule IX.
Mr. BERRY. I hope it will go over without prejudice to it, if the Senator from Maine objects to its consideration.
Mr. HANSBROUGH. I should be glad to have the joint resolution go over without prejudice. I certainly did not intend——
Mr. BERRY. If the Senator from Maine will permit me, this is not a proposition to drain land, but it is simply a proposition to survey land that has never been surveyed by the Government.
Mr. HALE. I am not debating the merits of the joint resolution. The Senator from Michigan has objected to its consideration.
Mr. BERRY. I hope it will not be put in a position where it can not be called up.
Mr. HALE. I do not propose that it shall be called up in the absence of Senators who take an interest in it.
Mr. BERRY. I do not suppose the Senator means that anybody will try to take that advantage.
Mr. HALE. Mr. President, what will be the result of the objection?
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution goes to the Calendar.
Mr. HANSBROUGH. I hope it will go to the Calendar without prejudice, and that the Senator from Maine will withdraw his request.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not think it could go elsewhere than to the regular Calendar, because it was reported this morning.

Mr. CLARK of Montana submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19681) to survey and allot the lands embraced within the limits of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and to open the surplus lands to settlement, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:
That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:
Strike out all of the Senate amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:
"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to immediately cause to be surveyed all of the lands embraced within the limits of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana.

"SEC. 2. That so soon as all the lands embraced within the Blackfeet Indian Reservation shall have been surveyed the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall cause allotments of the same to be made under the provisions of the allotment laws of the United States to all persons having tribal rights or holding tribal relations and may rightfully belong on said reservation. That there shall be allotted to each member forty acres of irrigable land and two hundred and forty acres of additional land valuable only for grazing purposes, or, at the option of the allottee, the entire two hundred and eighty acres may be taken in land valuable only for grazing purposes, and for the irrigable lands allotted there is hereby reserved out of the waters of the reservation sufficient to irrigate said irrigable lands, and the United States shall and does hold said reserved water in trust as appurtenant to the lands so allotted for the trust period named in the patent to be issued: Provided, That such reservation and trust shall only apply to such waters as may be actually and necessarily appropriated for the irrigable portions of Indian allotments within two years from the date of the issuance of the proclamation by the President opening the unallotted lands to settlement; and pending such actual appropriation of water by and for any Indian allottee, all of said waters shall be subject to use under the laws of Montana, but such use shall not be held to create a right adverse to any Indian allottee who actually appropriates water or for whom an actual appropriation of water is made to the extent that may be necessary for use on the allotment within the time limit aforesaid, but, on the contrary, each Indian allottee shall have and enjoy the prior right to appropriate water actually necessary for the irrigation of his or her allotment at any time within two years after the issue of the President's proclamation aforesaid: And provided further, That, subject to the foregoing provisions, all water rights and privileges on or connected with streams within or adjoining said reservation shall be subject to the laws of the State of Montana: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may reserve such lands as he may deem necessary for agency, school, and religious purposes, to remain reserved so long as needed and so long as agency, school, or religious institutions are maintained thereon for the benefit of the Indians, not exceeding two hundred and eighty acres to any one religious society; also such tract or tracts of timber lands as he may deem expedient for the use and benefit of the Indians of said reservation in common; but such reserved lands, or any part thereof, may be disposed of from time to time in such manner as the said Secretary may determine: Provided, That there is hereby granted two hundred and eighty acres each to the Holy Family mission, on Two Medicine Creek, and the mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church, near Browning, to be selected by the authorities of said missions, respectively, embracing the mission buildings and improvements thereon.

"SEC. 3. That upon the completion of said allotments the President of the United States shall appoint a commission consisting of three persons to inspect, appraise, and value all of the said lands that shall not have been allotted in severalty to said Indians or reserved by the Secretary of the Interior or otherwise disposed of; said commission to be constituted as follows: One commissioner shall be a person holding tribal relations with said Indians, one a resident citizen of the State of Montana, and one a United States special Indian agent or Indian inspector of the Interior Department.

"That within thirty days after their appointment said commissioners shall meet at some point within the Blackfeet Indian Reservation and organize by the election of one of their number as chairman. Said commission is hereby empowered to select a clerk at a salary of not to exceed five dollars per day.

"That said commissioners shall then proceed to personally inspect and classify and appraise, by the smallest legal subdivisions of forty acres each, all of the remaining lands embraced within said reservation. In making such classification and appraisement said lands shall be divided into the following classes: First, agricultural land of the first class; second, agricultural land of the second class; third, grazing land; fourth, timber land; fifth, mineral land, not to be appraised.

"That said commissioners shall be paid a salary of not to exceed ten dollars per day each while actually employed in the inspection and classification of said lands; such inspection and classification to be completed within nine months from the date of the organization of said commission.

"SEC. 4. That when said commission shall have completed the classification and appraisement of all of said lands and the same shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, the land shall be disposed of under the general provisions of the homestead, mineral, and town-site laws of the United States, except such of said lands as shall have been classified as timber lands, and except such sections sixteen and thirty-six of each township, or any part thereof, for which the State of Montana has not heretofore received indemnity lands under existing laws, which sections, or parts thereof, are hereby granted to the State of Montana for school purposes. And in case either of said sections or parts thereof is lost to the State of Montana by reason of allotment thereof to any Indian or Indians, or otherwise, the governor of said State, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, is hereby authorized to select other lands not occupied or reserved within said reservation, not exceeding two sections in any one township, which selections shall be made prior to the opening of the lands to settlement: Provided, That the United States shall pay to the said Indians for the lands in said sections sixteen and thirty-six, so granted, or the lands within said reservation selected in lieu thereof, the sum of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre.

"SEC. 5. That the lands so classified and appraised shall be opened to settlement and entry by proclamation of the President, which proclamation shall prescribe the time when and the manner in which these lands may be settled upon, occupied, and entered by persons entitled to make entry thereof, and no person shall be permitted to settle upon, occupy, or enter any of said lands, except as prescribed in such proclamation, until after the expiration of sixty days from the time when the same are opened to settlement and entry: Provided, That the rights of honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors of the late civil and the Spanish wars and the Philippine insurrection, as defined and described in sections twenty-three hundred and four and twenty-three hundred and five of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March first, nineteen hundred and one, shall not be abridged, but no entry shall be allowed under section twenty-three hundred and six of the Revised Statutes: Provided further, That the price of said lands shall be the appraised value thereof, as fixed by said commission, which in no case shall be less than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre for agricultural and grazing lands and five dollars per acre for timber lands; but settlers under the homestead law who shall reside upon and cultivate the land entered in good faith for the period required by existing law shall pay one-fifth of the appraised value in cash at the time of entry and the remainder in five equal annual installments, to be paid in one, two, three, four, and five years, respectively, from and after the date of entry, and when the entryman shall have complied with all the requirements and terms of the homestead laws as to settlement and residence, and shall have made all the required payments aforesaid, he shall be entitled to a patent for the lands entered: Provided, That he shall make his final proofs in accordance with the homestead laws within seven years from date of entry, and that aliens who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States may become such countrymen, but before making final proof and receiving patent they must receive their full naturalization papers: And provided further, That the fees and commissions at the time of commutation or final entry shall be the same as are now provided by law where the price of land is one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre: Provided, That if any entryman fails to make such payments, or any of them, within the time stated, or to make final proof within seven years from date of entry, all rights in and to the land covered by his entry shall at once cease, and any payments theretofore made shall be forfeited and the entry shall be forfeited and canceled: Provided, That nothing in this act shall prevent homestead settlers from commuting their entries under section twenty-three hundred and one, Revised Statutes, by paying for the land entered the price fixed by said commission, receiving credit for payments previously made.

"SEC. 6. That if, after the approval of the classification and appraisement, as provided herein, there shall be found lands within the limits of the reservation under irrigation projects deemed practicable under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June seventeenth, nineteen hundred and two, known as the "reclamation act," said lands shall be subject to withdrawal and be disposed of under the provisions of said act, and settlers shall pay, in addition to the cost of construction and maintenance provided therein, the appraised value, as provided in this act, to the proper officers, to be covered into the Treasury of the United States for the credit of the Indians: Provided, That all lands hereby opened to settlement remaining undisposed of at the end of five years from the taking effect of this act shall be sold to the highest bidder for cash, at not less than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior; and any lands remaining unsold ten years after said lands shall have been opened to entry shall be sold to the highest bidder, for cash, without regard to the minimum limit above stated: Provided, That not more than six hundred and forty acres of land shall be sold to any one person or company.

"SEC. 7. That the lands within said reservation not already previously entered, whether classified as agricultural, grazing, timber, or mineral lands, shall be subject to exploration, location, and purchase under the general provisions of the United States mineral and coal land laws, at the prices therein fixed, except that no mineral or coal exploration, location, or purchase shall be permitted upon any lands allotted to an Indian.

"SEC. 8. That lands classified and returned by said commission as timber lands shall be sold and disposed of by the Secretary of the Interior, under sealed bids to the highest bidder for cash at not less than five dollars per acre, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe: Provided, That the said timber lands shall be sold in tracts not exceeding forty acres, with preference right of purchase to actual settlers, including Indian allottees residing in the vicinity, at the highest price bid.

"SEC. 9. That after deducting the expenses of the commission of classification, appraisement, and sale of lands, and such other incidental expenses as shall have been necessarily incurred, including the cost of survey of said lands, the balance realized from the proceeds of the sale of the lands in conformity with this act shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and placed to the credit of said Indian tribe. Not exceeding one-third of the total amount thus deposited in the Treasury, together with one-third of the amount of the principal of all other funds now placed to the credit of or which is due said tribe of Indians from all sources, shall be expended from time to time by the Secretary of the Interior as he may deem advisable for the benefit of said Indians, in the construction and maintenance of irrigation ditches, the purchase of stock cattle, horses, and farming implements, and in their education and civilization. The remainder of all funds deposited in the Treasury realized from such sale of lands herein authorized, together with the remainder of all other funds now placed to the credit of or that shall hereafter become due to said tribe of Indians, shall, upon the date of the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of the allotments of land authorized by this act, be allotted in severalty to the members of the tribe, the persons entitled to share as members in such distribution to be determined by said Secretary. The funds thus allotted and apportioned shall be placed to the credit of such individuals upon the books of the United States Treasury for the benefit of such allottees, their legatees, or heirs. The President may, by Executive order, from time to time order the distribution and payment of such funds or the interest accruing therefrom to such individual members of the tribe as in his judgment would be for the best interests of such individuals to have such distribution made, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe therefor: Provided, That so long as the United States shall hold the funds as trustee for any member of the tribe, the Indian beneficiary shall be paid interest thereon annually at the rate of four per centum per annum.

"SEC. 10. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of sixty-five thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay for the lands granted to the State of Montana and for lands reserved for agency and school purposes, at the rate of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre; also, the sum of seventy-five thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to survey, classify, and appraise the lands of said reservation as provided herein, and also to defray the expense of the appraisement and survey of said town sites, the latter sums to be reimbursable out of the funds arising from the sale of said lands.

"SEC. 11. That nothing in this act contained shall in any manner bind the United States to purchase any part of the land herein described, except sections sixteen and thirty-six, or the equivalent in each township that may be granted to the State of Montana, the reserved tracts hereinbefore mentioned for agency and school purposes, or to dispose of said land except as provided herein, or to guarantee to find purchasers for said lands or any part thereof, it being the intention of this act that the United States shall act as trustee for said Indians to dispose of said lands and to expend and pay over the proceeds received from the sale thereof only as received.

"SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to reserve and set aside for town-site purposes, and to survey, lay out, and plat into town lots, streets, alleys, and parks, not less than eighty acres of said land at or near the present settlements of Browning and Babb, and each of such other places as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary or convenient for town sites, in such manner as will best subserve the present needs and the reasonable prospective growth of said settlements. Such town sites shall be surveyed, appraised, and disposed of as provided in section twenty-three hundred and eighty-one of the United States Revised Statutes: Provided, That any person who at the date when the appraisers commence their work upon the land, shall be an actual resident upon any one such lot and the owner of substantial and permanent improvements thereon, and who shall maintain his or her residence and improvements on such lot to the date of his or her application to enter, shall be entitled to enter at any time prior to the day fixed for the public sale, and at the appraised value thereof, such lot and any one additional lot of which he or she may also be in possession and upon which he or she may have substantial and permanent improvements: Provided further, That before making entry of any such lot or lots, the applicant shall make proof to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of the land district in which the land lies of such residence, possession, and ownership of improvements, under such regulations as to time, notice, manner, and character of proof as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That in making their appraisal of the lots so surveyed it shall be the duty of the appraisers to ascertain the names of the residents upon and occupants of any such lots, the character and extent of the improvements thereon, and the name of the reputed owner thereof, and to report their findings in connection with their report of appraisal, which report of findings shall be taken as prima facie evidence of the facts therein set out. All such lots not so entered prior to the day fixed for the public sale shall be offered at public outcry in their regular order with the other unimproved and unoccupied lots: Provided, however, That no lot shall be sold for less than ten dollars: And provided further, That said lots when surveyed shall approximate fifty by one hundred and fifty feet in size."

STATISTICS RELATIVE TO THE SUEZ CANAL.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I ask an order for the printing of a letter which I hold in my hand on a very important subject that is now before the Senate.

In our duties that we are performing now daily under the regular order that has been on the Calendar before the Senate, the Senate and the country are having a great deal of anxiety about the amount of money that is to be expended in the construction of the Panama Canal, no matter whether it is a sea-level or whether it is a lock canal, and they seem to have lost sight of the question which lies still further off, as to whether this is going to be a remunerative enterprise in either form or type of canal that may be constructed.

I took occasion to write to Gen. George W. Davis, who is the best informed man whom I know of, in regard to the situation of the Suez Canal, as to its capitalization, as to its reserve funds, as to the dividends upon the stock, and the amount of tonnage which passes through that canal. He very kindly replied to my inquiries, and I will read the letter to the Senate in order that they may have some idea of its importance:

[Senate Document No. 492, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.]

Letter from Mr. George W. Davis, giving certain data relating to the Suez Canal.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 14, 1906.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Replying to your favor of yesterday, I give you the following data respecting the Suez Canal:

The original capital of the company, issued before 1870, was 400,000 shares, at 500 francs each; but these securities do not answer to our definition either of stocks or bonds, as they partake of the character of both. Under the terms of issue there was a condition that the shares could be redeemed in certain proportions at stated periods and that when redeemed they should be no longer an interest-bearing security, but should continue to constitute an asset to the original owner of the shares to the extent that he should participate in all surplus benefits earned by the company; but the interest provided by the statute—5 per cent—stopped when the bond should be called for redemption.

On the 31st of December, 1904, there were 385,460 of these shares still outstanding, and they continued to enjoy participation in the surplus benefits or profits of the company. But the interest on the residue of these bonds had ceased; that is to say, on 14,600 shares. The other outstanding securities of the Suez Canal Company are bond issues, as follows: First, an issue of 400,000 shares, at 85 francs, put out in order to take up unpaid coupons on the original issue, this being really to make good a deficit arising in the earlier years of the operation of the company, when its revenues were small. These bonds were entitled to 5 per cent interest, and the value of those still unredeemed and outstanding is 32,919,310 francs. Of the loan of 1867–68, which was in 300-franc shares, there was still outstanding on the date above specified 53,160,600 francs. In 1871 a still further issue of 100-franc shares was made, of which are yet unpaid 1,678,000 francs. A further loan was made in 1880 at 3 per cent, of which 24,575,770 francs remained unpaid at the end of 1904.

In 1887 there was still a further loan negotiated at 3 per cent, the aggregate of which still remaining unredeemed is 97,362,450 francs. The aggregate of all these issues, stock and bonds, came to the total of 402,296,130 francs, or $80,500,000. This is all of the capital stock of the Suez Canal Company, except that there remains an obligation resting on the company to pay 10 per cent of their surplus profits to the original founders, constituting all those who formed the original company that Mr. De Lesseps exploited. These founders' interests are divided into 100,000, and each now receives about one-half as much annually as the owners of each original share received.

The only reserve of which I can get any trace, maintained by the Suez Canal Company, is one of $5,000,000, which is required by the statute to be maintained, so as to equalize profits and losses and to provide for emergencies. There is another fund of small amount maintained as a pension and retirement fund, disbursed for the benefit of employees of long standing and of recognized merit. But the aggregate of this fund is not a large one.

The last quotation for Suez Canal stock that I have seen is for May, 1906, when it was quoted at the Bourse as 4,515 francs. As the par value of the share is 500 francs, you can readily see that these securities are at 900 per cent premium.

The dividend paid last year on the original shares was a net of 141 francs per share. This included the 25 francs (5 per cent interest) referred to above as having ceased on certain of the shares of the original stock that had been called in and redeemed. The per cent of dividend was therefore about 28. The tonnage passing the Suez Canal last year was 13,000,000 net tons, and the toll rate was 7¾ francs per ton.

Under the terms of the concession, which extended for ninety-nine years from the date of completion of the canal—1869—all the securities will have been retired and canceled on maturity, and amortization provisions are arranged to that end.

The Government of England paid almost exactly £4,000,000 for the shares bought by Beaconsfield from the Khedive. The dividend on these shares last year for the benefit of the British Government was £933,000.

The authorities, for the information contained in the above, are: L'Economiste, a French publication with which you are no doubt familiar; the Statist, an English publication devoted to statistical matters; also a recently published work on the Suez Canal, by J. Charles-Roux, entitled "L'Isthme et le Canal de Suez," Paris, 1901, and The Stock Exchange Official Intelligence for 1905.

Hoping the above will meet your necessity, I remain, as ever,

Yours, sincerely,

GEO. W. DAVIS.

Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN,
Capitol, Washington, D. C.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to have this letter printed as a document for the use of the Senate. It certainly is something that is of the very greatest importance.

I wish to say in connection with it that I hope we will get rid of any hysterical idea in discussing the great proposition that is before us to the effect that we are wasting money upon it. We may be spending money very improvidently, and I think for the want of a proper system and management we are doing just that thing; and it is going to require very careful work on the part of the Senate of the United States and the Congress of the United States to devise and put in force a system of expenditures and accounting there that will prove to be justly and properly economical in the handling of this great fund.

But, Mr. President, what we are putting into this canal is in an investment. I will suppose that it is $500,000,000; it is still an investment. It is not money thrown away. It is not money loaned out and lost. It is not money expended in war or money given to benevolent purposes and the like of that, but it is money invested.

Now, as to what is the likelihood of profit upon the investment can be best ascertained by a reference to these figures of the Suez Canal. Nine hundred per cent——

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to ask the Senator if there is stated in the letter the exact cost of the Suez Canal, the whole cost?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; the whole amount expended. I do not know whether it is for the canal proper, as it first was, or whether it is for the canal with the betterments that have been made to it since. General Davis has not divided that; but if it is necessary, I can get that information from him, I have no doubt.

What I wish to say is this, Mr. President: When the stock of the Suez Canal, with 13,000,000 tonnage passing through it annually, not a sailing ship going through it, all steamers, is worth a premium of 900 per cent on the Bourse in Paris, there need not be any despair or any excitement or any apprehension among Members of Congress or the people in regard to the outcome of this work when it shall be completed. We have the ability to take hold of this work, and by taxing our people to pay bond issues to complete it without ever stopping a wheel in the whole work for a second. If it should last for twenty-five years we have got the ability to do it. But that is not what I am acting upon. I am acting upon the idea that if this canal gets only 13,000,000 tons of transportation on which tolls are to be charged we could run the stock of the canal up if it were a commercial enterprise, a stock enterprise, to 400 or 500 per cent in four or five years after the canal is completed, if it takes twenty years to complete it.

I wish to say that I regard this as the very best investment that any Government has ever had an opportunity to make of its money in any work of permanent improvement. I say that, Mr. President, notwithstanding I have always said—and it is unnecessary that I should repeat it—that I have very great misgivings as to whether or not after all we shall be able to overcome the natural difficulties that confront us in the building and maintenance of this canal; but we have got to take the risk, and we are ready to take it. I have not any doubt about the determination of almost every man in the United States to take the risk, whatever it may be. I have no right to make predictions about it, but I can not resist, in justice to my own opinion, reserving to myself the apprehension that after all we are putting our money down at the wrong place. That is my judgment, and I have thought so from the beginning.

That is what I wish to say in regard to this very important statement of General Davis. I will now ask that it shall be printed as a document for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks for the printing of the document to which he has referred, for the use of the Senate. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further concurrent or other resolutions? If not, the morning business is closed.

FIRE DEPARTMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 4464, being what is known as the "firemen's bill," which was considered yesterday. It will only take a moment to complete its consideration. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who yesterday objected to the bill, has since investigated the matter, and I believe is now satisfied that the bill shall pass.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4464) to classify the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may now be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 6191) to provide for the construction of a sea-level canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the method of construction.

Mr. TELLER obtained the floor.

Mr. McLAURIN. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. TELLER. I should like to know for what purpose. Then I can decide.

Mr. McLAURIN. I desire to ask the Senator if he will yield to allow me to ask unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of Senate bill 1291, for the relief of James W. Watson. It will take but a few minutes to dispose of it.

Mr. TELLER. I will yield, reserving to myself the privilege of resuming the floor if the bill shall lead to debate.

JAMES W. WATSON.

Mr. McLAURIN. I now ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1291) for the relief of James W. Watson.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the balance due from the Merchants' National Bank of Helena, Mont., to James W. Watson, amounting to $13,113.69, be, and the same is hereby, allowed by the Office of Indian Affairs and the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, and said accounts of James W. Watson, late acting United States Indian agent, Crow Agency, Mont., be credited therewith, allowing him to be fully discharged from any further liability therefor.

SEC. 2. That the said James W. Watson, after the balance of his accounts shall have been passed upon by the court before which they are now pending, be authorized and allowed to submit the same to the Office of Indian Affairs, for the purpose of correcting his record at that office.

SEC. 3. That the said Watson be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to show before the court the expenditure of said moneys charged against him under the act of July 4, 1884, and other acts or parts of acts, by supplemental vouchers, or facts, or other testimony which shall be accepted by the court, such as showing to the satisfaction of the court the expenditure of said sum so charged back for the uses, purposes, benefit, and good of said agency and the Indians thereof.

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect and be in full force and effect from and after its passage and approval.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like the Senator who has the bill in charge to make some explanation of it.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], who reported the bill, is really more familiar with the facts than I am. This is a bill to relieve, as the title states, Capt. James W. Watson, of the Tenth Cavalry. He was appointed just before the Spanish war as an agent at the Crow Indian Agency, in Montana. When he received the appointment he found certain moneys, to be used for the benefit of the Indians, deposited in a bank. He left that money in the bank. Afterwards the bank failed while the money was there, I think amounting to about $38,500. Twenty-odd thousand dollars of the money has been paid by the bank since it has been in liquidation.

Mr. SPOONER. Was it a national bank?

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not remember what bank it was, but the report shows.

Mr. McCUMBER. It was a national bank, Mr. President. I am acquainted with the facts.

Mr. SPOONER. What does this bill permit the claimant to do in the court that he could not do without it?

Mr. McLAURIN. I will state to the Senator, unless the Senator from North Dakota will answer that question——

Mr. SPOONER. I only want it in a word.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator from Mississippi could answer, but I will simply say that legally Captain Watson would, of course, be responsible, but not morally, considering the course of the dealings in the matter of Indian funds, which had been kept in the same bank by his predecessor and which he supposed he had a right to keep in the bank, although it was not a Government depository. He had really no legal authority for doing it, and this is to excuse him for the loss of funds by the defalcation of the bank.

Mr. McLAURIN. I would say to the Senator from Wisconsin, if I can have the attention of the Senator——

Mr. SPOONER. I am listening.

Mr. McLAURIN. I will say to the Senator that by the law as it stood at the time when this transaction occurred, if there were any mistake in a voucher, even if the voucher were for $10,000 and there was a mistake of a dollar, the law required that the whole amount be charged against the agent. As shown by the report, it was impossible for the agent to be at all the places where these moneys were expended. The Government furnished him clerks——

Mr. TELLER. I yielded for the consideration of this bill with the expectation that it would be passed without debate, but I can not yield further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. McLAURIN. I want to make one statement to the Senate with reference to the bill. This is a very important matter to this man.

Mr. TELLER. I must decline to yield if the bill is to lead to further debate at this time. It can be passed later. If I yield to one Senator I must to everybody, as it is a debatable subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado has the floor.

Mr. TELLER subsequently said: If the bill which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] called up can be passed without further debate, I will withdraw any objection to its consideration.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not know whether or not it can be passed without further debate, if Senators object to it, but I should like to have it considered and I should like to have it passed.

I repeat, this measure is a matter of very great importance to this man. He is not morally responsible for the loss of any of this money; he is guilty of no moral wrong, and the Department say that he is not. The man has nothing in the world except his salary. He has been an officer of the Army for twenty-odd years, for he went to West Point about 1878, I think, and after he graduated he went into the Army and has been in the Army ever since. He has made a splendid officer. If this measure does not pass, it will drive him out of the Army and there will not be a dollar recovered for the Government. That is all I can say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the further consideration of the bill at this time? The Chair hears none; and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I have no objection to this bill, so far as it relieves this officer from liability for moneys deposited in the national bank at Helena and lost through the failure of the bank and through no fault on his part; but it goes beyond that and authorizes him to make supplemental vouchers for money that he had disbursed.

Mr. McLAURIN. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I can explain to him that there is not only nothing wrong in that, but there is nothing illegal in it and there is nothing inequitable in it. The Government furnished him clerks. One was C. H. Barstow and another J. A. Gogarty. Those clerks fixed up the vouchers, and if they made a mistake of a dollar in a thousand-dollar voucher that thousand dollars is charged to Captain Watson, and every other dollar of it has been paid. The bill only allows him to go before the court and show how much money really was paid out by him and to give him credit for every dollar paid, and nothing else. That is all the bill proposes to do.

Mr. SPOONER. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SITE FOR PUBLIC BUILDING AT GREAT FALLS, MONT.

Mr. CLARK of Montana. I ask the Senator from Colorado to yield to me that I may enter a motion.

Mr. TELLER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Montana. Yesterday, when the bill (S. 544) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Great Falls, Mont., was under consideration, some amendments to it were adopted which it is now found require further consideration. I therefore move that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered, and that a message be sent to the House of Representatives requesting the return of the bill, in case it has been sent to that body.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider will be entered; and, without objection, the House of Representatives will be requested to return the bill.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES ON COLUMBIA INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. PILES. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington appeals to me to yield to him; I do not know for what purpose.

Mr. PILES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 18668) ratifying and confirming soldiers' additional homestead entries heretofore made and allowed upon lands embraced in what was formerly the Columbia Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. TELLER. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. PILES. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 3, after the word "all," it is proposed to strike out "entries" and insert "applications to make entry;" and at the beginning of line 7 to strike out "accepted at" and insert "filed in;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That applications to make entry under section 2306 of the Revised Statutes of the United States for lands embraced in what was formerly the Columbia Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, heretofore made in good faith and filed in the local land office of the land district in which said lands are situated, under and pursuant to the practice of the Department theretofore existing, are hereby ratified and confirmed, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to issue patents in all such cases in which patent has not already issued.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

JUDD J. HARTZELL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Colorado to yield to me for a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7771) for the relief of Judd O. Hartzell, to report it without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa for the present consideration of the bill named by him?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Judd O. Hartzell, of Laharpe, Ill., $960, to reimburse him for that sum paid by him for a technical violation of the internal-revenue laws of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PANAMA CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 6191) to provide for the construction of a sea-level canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the method of construction.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I desire to present some matters in connection with the character of the canal that we have determined shall be built to connect the waters of the Atlantic with those of the Pacific Ocean. I do not expect to go into the history of the canal. That has been done pretty thoroughly by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE], who has the bill in charge, and also by those Senators who have spoken in favor of the lock plan of canal.

In the early part of the session I submitted my ideas as to what the character of the canal should be; but since that time there have been statements made and arguments advanced that I wish very briefly to controvert. I desire, first, to address myself to the proposition whether the type of the canal should be determined by the question of cost. Here is an enterprise which I think everyone will admit is in magnitude, and perhaps in effect, the greatest national enterprise that any nation has ever undertaken; certainly it is the greatest in modern times. There may have been in the history of the world, particularly in prehistoric times, some enterprise carried on that may have required more labor and more effort than this, but certainly in modern times there has been no expenditure of money by a nation in any work of this character that would equal the amount that it is probable we shall be compelled to expend to complete the construction of the Panama Canal. That statement holds true whether we shall expend the amount of money estimated by the engineers of the world or whether it will require an expenditure that some who are not connected with the work believe will have to be made.

We have declared before the world that we are going to build an isthmian canal. A quarter of a century ago, when the French company undertook to build a canal across the Isthmus of Panama, we said in a very quiet way that there was no objection to a French company building such a canal; but if the French company failed, as it was anticipated by many that it would, then this Government would object to the French Government building the canal. So when the canal company did fail the French Government was prohibited and precluded from taking any part in the work of taking up the construction of the canal, even if it desired so to do.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] the other day said he thought they were too wise to do so. I doubt whether at that time they were too wise. The French people had put $262,000,000 in the enterprise, and it was supposed then that $100,000,000 more would complete the work. If that supposition had been well founded, which it was not, it would undoubtedly have been wise for the French Government to have saved, if possible, to the citizens of that country their investment.

I do not know that I am quite willing to subscribe to the suggestion made a few moments ago by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] that this canal is going to be such a great commercial success. That is a matter about which we may differ.

We have assumed the right to build this canal, and we have denied the right of any other Government to build it. To-day we deny to any company or any corporation or any combination of capitalists the right to build it. We stand there saying, "We will build this canal." That being so, shall we stop and consider what it shall cost? The individual who enters into an enterprise, great or small, should rightfully and properly consider whether his resources will enable him to complete it. Does anybody here, Mr. President, believe, whatever may be its cost, whether it be $247,000,000 or $500,000,000, that this Government is able to complete this enterprise? It is too late, in my judgment, to consider the element of cost.

Then, there is another element, upon which apparently both the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN], who spoke yesterday, place much reliance. That is the element of time. In my judgment, we have not any business, under the conditions that now exist, to consider how much this canal will cost, neither have we any business to consider how long it will take to complete the enterprise. Other people might possibly have completed it in less time, but they were not allowed to do so.

When you have considered the question of cost, in the first instance, and when you have considered the question of time, you have got to consider what is the type of canal that the business of the world demands. What kind of a canal is it that we are under obligations to build? Not only a canal that can take the small ships from one ocean to another, but one that will take every ship and any ship that comes. Our determination to do that is foreshadowed and declared by the Spooner Act.

I know, Mr. President, that the minority of the Board of Engineers say that it is doubtful whether the great ships of the world will ever want to go through the canal. I do not know that they will; but I think that will depend upon the type of the canal. I am sure it will be very doubtful whether the great ships of the world will go through it if it is built with locks.

It is necessary to refer briefly, but not in detail, to what has been done on this canal. When the man who had won fame by his success in building the Suez Canal had taken hold of the project of a canal across the Isthmus of Panama, it was thought that it would be carried to completion; but when the money that ought to have gone into the canal had been largely wasted, at all events, when the De Lesseps Canal Company had reached a point where no more money could be secured, they stopped work on the canal and stood still, and the company went into bankruptcy. Then there was organized another, a French company, with a moderate amount of capital compared with the amount that would be required to complete the work. Everyone who knows anything about it knows that that company was organized to save as much as possible out of the wreck of the old company. They had then under their concession from Colombia nine years in which to complete the canal. A board of engineers of European reputation and some American engineers were employed by this new company to determine how they could save something out of the wreck.

Let me say that when this technical commission came to make their report—and I have it here on my table—they said it "has been demonstrated, as far as we have gone, that a sea-level canal is feasible." That was one of the first enunciations of that board of engineers; but they then said—not in the exact language, of course, that I am using—"We have got nine years in which to build the canal. It will take us one year to organize and secure money enough to go on. Can we build the canal on the original plan within the time and for the money we can raise?" They decided that they could not, and the company's instructions to the board—and any Senator can read them here; I am not going to stop to read those things; but they are printed in a document here to which every Senator can have access—were: "You must consider two items when you come to decide this question. First, can you build the sea-level canal in eight years? We have nine years within which to do it, but it will take us a year to get ready to start." The answer was, they could not. Then it was asked, "Can you build it for the money we can raise?" The engineers answered, "No." Then they said, "In determining the type of the canal you must keep in sight all the time the conditions under which you are to build it. First, you have not time to build a sea-level canal, and, secondly, you have not the money with which to build it."

Mr. President, I have read everything, I think, that has been published upon this subject in the last twenty years, and I say here that no board of engineers have at any time said that it is impossible or impracticable to build a sea-level canal. Individual engineers may have said it. In 1879, when the engineering talent of the world was assembled at Paris, nearly ten times as many engineers declared in favor of a sea-level canal as declared in favor of a lock canal. I challenge anybody to show me that any engineer in that meeting ever suggested that a lock canal would be better than a sea-level canal. On the contrary, the American engineers who objected to a sea-level canal objected solely and entirely upon the ground that the commerce which would go through the canal would not justify the building of so expensive a canal. I state this to meet the statement which has been made twice on this floor that the technical committee declared it was impracticable to build a sea-level canal—impracticable, as they said, under the conditions existing, poverty and lack of time.

Mr. President, I have read the report of the majority of the Board, and I have read the report of the minority of the Board. I have read the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission. I have read all these papers carefully. Yet I venture to say not a report has come here, except within the last year, which would justify anybody in saying that if the cost of a sea-level canal was the same as that of a lock canal it would be better to build a lock canal. Eliminating the element of cost and considering only the element of advantage, I venture to say you can not get in this country 5 per cent of the respectable engineers who would not assert that a sea-level canal is better than a lock canal.

I have had the opportunity in the last ten years of consulting and conversing with a large number of American engineers, some of whom have been on the ground. One of them was one of the best engineers in this country. He has had no connection with these recent transactions. He is as able as any man on the Board. He spent a year down there. I believe every man of that class will say "If you can build a sea-level canal for the same money, of course you should build a sea-level canal."

Those, Mr. President, are the points with which I want to start out. As I have said, I do not intend to make an extended speech on this subject. I went over the matter at considerable length in the early part of the session. I listened yesterday to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN], and I am sorry his speech is not in the RECORD this morning, so that I could quote him exactly in the somewhat pathetic appeal he made to us to build the best canal that could be built. I sympathize with him in that sentiment. I put myself on record in December last that there was an obligation on us, which the world expected us to fulfill, to build the very best canal that could be built. The Senator from New Jersey concludes and certifies himself that the best possible canal which can be built is a lock canal He quoted the chairman of the Commission, Mr. Shonts, and he quoted also the Chief Engineer of the canal in support of the declaration that if you could build a sea-level canal for the same money you ought not to build a sea-level canal, but you ought to build a lock canal. Mr. President, Mr. Shonts is not an engineer. He is a railroad man and has been engaged in running a railroad across the praries of Illinois and Indiana. There is no evidence that I know of that he has ever dealt with any great enterprises in any shape or manner. I can tolerate that statement made by a layman. But Mr. Stevens is an engineer by profession, by education, and by experience, and when he says to the Board of Engineers, when he says to the country at large, that, in his judgment, a sea-level canal is not as valuable as a lock canal, and that, eliminating the idea of expense, he would build a lock canal, I say, with all respect, that he discredits himself before the engineers of this country.

I venture to say that no man who is not a partisan of a particular type of canal, and who has not an end to serve, and who has any reputation as an engineer, will stand before the world and say that an open-water cut across the Isthmus is not better than climbing an elevation of 85 feet.

Mr. President, I desire to say a few words about time. As I have said, I do not think we should consider the matter of time. What difference does it make to the American people whether it takes eight years or twelve years? Are we to derive so much immediate benefit and advantage from the building of the canal that we must make haste to build it? I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a statement made by the head of the Panama Canal at Atlanta on the 30th day of May. Mr. Shonts made an address at a banquet:

> In his formal address this evening Mr. Shonts said that between the time of the selling of the supplies which will enter into the construction of the Panama Canal and the period when the opening of the canal will result in the development of the country a gulf is fixed. How great and how wide that gulf is will depend on the type of canal selected. Mr. Shonts spoke in favor of a lock canal, as recommended by the minority of the consulting board and indorsed by the Canal Commission. He said, in conclusion:
> "The practical question for all sections of the country is, How long shall we want before we can enter upon the period of development which the opening of the canal will bring to the country? I am not surprised that European countries are indifferent to the early completion of this canal. I am not surprised that they are indifferent as to how much this canal may cost our Government. I am not surprised that they can view calmly an indefinite postponement of the opening of this great waterway. They are neither paying the bills, nor will their commerce and industries suffer by waiting for the completion of this undertaking.
> "But I am surprised that those who are supposed to represent the best interests of the American people—

That, I suppose, refers to the American Senate and the American House—> should try to throw obstacles in the way of realizing the benefits of this work at the earliest possible date. When we can get a better canal for less money, and receive the benefits ourselves, why wait; why make it a heritage to our children, with the possibility of their being deprived of its benefits through some unforeseen contingency?

> I have spoken of a gulf. Now, how wide that gulf shall be depends on the people. Do you want to reap the benefit of this undertaking yourselves, or do you want to transmit a hope to your children or your children's children?

Mr. President, Mr. Shonts's idea is accepted by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN] as to some extent controlling us in our determination of this question. That is particularly true of the Senator who addressed us yesterday, the Senator from New Jersey, who dwelt with much force upon the idea that he advanced as coming from Mr. Shonts and Mr. Stevens. I was sorry that one or the other of the Senators did not tell what the immediate benefit is to be to this country from the canal. I am one of those who do not look forward to any immediate advantage, nor in the future to any great advantage that will accrue to us as a nation. We will open the canal to all the world on the same terms that our own citizens use it. Every American ship will pay according to its tonnage the same rate as every European ship will pay. It does not make any difference whether the ship is going to China or going to San Francisco from New York, or any other city; it will pay the same.

If, as anticipated, there shall be a tremendous commerce going through the canal, the money that we put in will be returned in the way of interest. But I am not one of those who have been so hopeful of this return. However, no one of the advocates of the lock canal has yet told us why we should sacrifice the character of the canal for the sake of saving time or money. It is true, the other day the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] told us that all the money put into the canal which was wasted, or the money that was put in beyond what was necessary, came out of the taxes paid by the people. That is true. It all comes out of the taxes paid by the people. The people who do the business of this country will pay for it. But if the canal is to be so advantageous as Mr. Shonts and some other gentlemen think, then it will make but little difference whether it costs $247,000,000 or $325,000,000. If it pays a good round interest, it will be a good investment. I wish I could be as optimistic about it as is the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], provided, he says, it is a success.

Mr. President, if there was to be immediate gain, if there was prospect of immediate returns to a considerable extent more than anybody now claims, I do not believe we would be justified in sacrificing the character of the canal for the purpose of immediately participating in those gains. If the canal is built, it ought to be as good in a thousand years, or in two thousand years, as ever, and if the interests of mankind demand a waterway across there to-day, they will certainly demand it in all time. I join with the Senator from New Jersey in saying that this is the opportunity for us to get the best canal that can be made. I deny the conclusion at which the Senator arrives—that the best canal which can be made will have locks by which the ships of the world must climb over a mountain.

Of course, I know there are lock canals which are a success. In New York is the Erie Canal, from Buffalo to New York. It has been a great success, and the State is about to expend a hundred million dollars more on it to increase its capacity; and it will be a success. But it is not anything like this canal, nor will this canal be anything like the New York canal. I know there is a canal between the Great Lakes. We call it the "Soo Canal." It has carried a tonnage greater than any other canal in the world, and it has been a great success. It belongs to the Government of the United States. It has been a great help to commerce. That canal is 2 miles long, or to be accurate, 1.6 miles. It has a lock, a lock which lifts less than 20 feet—19 feet and a fraction, if I am not mistaken. It has one lock. The lock that is to be built on this canal will have a lift of practically 30 feet—almost 29 feet. Instead of there being one lock, there are to be three locks on the Atlantic side and three locks on the Pacific side. The Manchester Canal has some locks, but their lifts are nothing like the lifts on this canal.

Mr. President, I challenge the friends of the lock-canal system to show anywhere in the world a lock canal like unto this. There is none. There is no place on the Manchester Canal or any other canal in Europe where there are three locks in succession by which a ship must climb a hill. I do not care to go into details, but I wish to suggest to the Senate, I wish to suggest to intelligent business men, whether it is not much more difficult to carry on a canal with three locks, one above the other, than it is a canal with one lock. I want to ask any intelligent man—he need not be an engineer—what would happen to a great ship like one of those that Mr. Hill is running now from our western ports to Asia if, in going across from either side, an error should occur in the handling of the ship and the ship should go with its great weight against one of those gates. The gate has not been built, and it never will be built, which would hold one of those ships, and when it strikes one of those gates, it would go down clear through to the bottom. The chances are a hundred to one it would carry the flight with it. If anybody doubts that, let him take the testimony of Mr. Hunter, who is on this Board and who has had as much to do with this question as any man in the country, unless it may be Mr. Davis.

But you do not need an engineer to tell you the danger of a lock canal. I see the minority of the committee say that these gates will weigh 450 tons. They will weigh practically twice that if we get the right kind of gates. They should weigh 800 tons, and they will weigh 800 tons. The lowest estimate I have seen made by anybody has been 750 tons; and the minority of the committee says 450 tons. These gates must be handled, not as we handle the gates on the old Erie Canal, where they put in a couple of gates, with a long timber sticking out, and a man goes on the timber and moves the gate and swings it around. That can not be done with these gates. With 30 feet of water against them they can not be opened and they can not be closed except by machinery, and delicate yet powerful machinery at that.

For fear I may forget it, I wish to suggest here that in these days of dynamite it would be easy for somebody to step in and with a piece of dynamite which he could carry in his vest pocket disable every lock in the whole flight. It may be said that will not be done. Probably not in ordinary conditions; probably not in the usual conditions of life. But suppose we were having trouble with some foreign power, and we had our Pacific fleet on the Pacific side and wanted to bring it across. Do you believe it would be difficult for some power to shut off our right of way, you may say, across the Isthmus? How easy it would be! "Oh," they say, "you can guard it." But you would need an army to guard it.

On the other end there is to be a lock under any conditions. There must be. As was said here by the Senator who has this bill in charge, in the admirable presentation he made of this case when he opened it, that is a lock which will stand open half the time; nay, more than half the time. It is a lock which, if destroyed, will not destroy the canal. But the flight of locks on the other side will be within reach of the great guns of the navies of the world, and every one of those locks can be put out of commission in an hour by a great naval ship. But I will not anticipate such troubles. I will not anticipate a war. I will anticipate that persons hostile to the carrying of ships through there may do this, and they can do it readily and easily. And yet the minority of the committee tell us that they prefer a lock canal to a sea-level canal, because they say a ship can go through it quicker than it can through a sea-level canal. When the ship enters the water at sea level, it will steam cautiously through, I admit. But it does not make much difference whether it goes through in fifty-five minutes more or fifty-five minutes less. The question is, Can the ship go through safely, and through which canal can it go with the greater safety?

Mr. President, I desire to touch very briefly on the question of the dam. I will say that I am not going into an extensive argument on this subject, for, in my judgment, every Senator has already practically made up his mind for what kind of a canal he is going to vote. I will first speak of the character of the canal which the President is going to build if we do not intervene. It is said the President will build a lock canal, because he is authorized to do so by the Spooner amendment. That was a remarkable amendment, I admit, one which perhaps ought to have been modified. I voted for the Spooner amendment. I voted for it with the declaration from my place here that I did not believe we ought to build a canal at all. I voted for it with the declaration that if we built the canal at all it ought to be a sea-level canal; and because you could not build a sea-level canal on the Nicaragua route, I would vote to allow the President to build the canal on the Panama route, if he saw fit, and if he could make proper arrangements with the French company. So I voted for it.

We had a plan submitted by our Commission for a canal across there, if we undertook to build it, and that was to be a lock canal. I knew it was a lock canal. If the President of the United States has any authority to build this canal without our indicating how it shall be built, he is bound to build the canal which was thus laid out for him to build. He has no right to build any other.

The Walker Commission proposed a dam at Bohio. The present proposition of the minority of the committee is to build a dam at Gatun. To-day there is not an engineer in the country who would advise the building of a dam where the Walker Commission or the Isthmian Commission suggested it ought to be built. Nobody pretends that it could be built with safety there. The Commission on two occasions declared that it was the only place where they could build a dam across that river; that there was no other place between that and Colon where a dam could be built.

But it is said that the President has a right to build a dam somewhere else. I deny it. Therefore I think it is incumbent on us to fix the type of the canal and fix the place where the dam shall be built, if dams are to be built, and of locks, if locks are to be built.

Mr. President, I will spend very little time on the question of the dam. The Senator from New Jersey yesterday went into an extensive discussion of the character of the dam. He said that it would be a mile long and half a mile thick and is to hold a body of water 85 feet high. That dam can undoubtedly be built, and the plan the minority suggest is the best possible way that it can be built—that is, by the use of water, transporting the material to the dam through water and depositing it. That is the best way you can build a dam. I have no doubt that you can build a dam there that for a time at least will hold the water that is put in it. I doubt myself whether there would be very much seepage through a dam built in that way of the width that it is proposed to build it.

But, Mr. President, that it not the vice of this dam. The vice of this dam is in the foundation; it is in the ground upon which you build it. The same objection rests at Gatun that rests at Bohio as to the foundation. They tell us, as they told us at the other place, that they had bed rock. Yet when a man went there who knew enough to see that one hole down there does not determine the character of the subsoil and does not show what is below 100 or 200 feet, it was found that what they had called a bed rock were simply floating rocks in the mud and débris that had been washed in there. The same identical thing exists at Gatun, except that it is said that there is some clay somewhere there. Yet it is admitted that there are two places of several hundred feet where no foundation can be had.

It has been suggested, and it was suggested before the committee that that difficulty could be met by putting in a foundation. But that is not the plan of the minority. The plan of the minority and of the minority board is to put a dam there and depend upon the weight of the dam to hold the water from the horizontal thrust and keep it back. They have lost sight of the fact that this dam will cover a large area of ground, and that the weight of the water 85 feet high will be upon every square foot of it. Everywhere the weight will be pressing down. They admit that in the borings they made they found that water percolated through. I notice that our committee say that the water evidently did not come from the river, but probably came from the hills.

Mr. President, it did not come from the river, and it did come from the hills, and it shows that there are waterways existing now under the dam. If it had come from the river the weight of the water might have kept it out, but it is coming from the hills above, and when the pressure of the water shall force the water down into that soft, muddy ground it will meet the little rills coming from the hills and you will find your dam with water seeping under it and ultimately washing it away.

At least, Mr. President, this is an experiment. There is no such dam on the face of the earth and never has been. I challenge any member of the committee to show any dam that corresponds in character with it. No dam has ever been built upon that character of ground without some preparation to protect the underdrain. There are very few engineers who will not testify that that is the danger which threatens this dam. It is not that the dam will be pushed over by the weight of the water.

Mr. President, for twenty years I have made a study of dams. I have made it because in my section of the country it is necessary to some extent that we should do those things. I have made it because I have had a taste for those things all my life. I can state here that I believe I have read a description of the character of practically every great dam in the world, and I say now that no engineer has been brave enough or reckless enough heretofore to propose the building of a dam under the conditions you propose to build this dam. If anybody doubts the statement I am making let him go to the records. Go to your library and take the works upon dams. Take the French works. The oldest dam in the world, outside of India, and the highest dam in the world is in Spain. It is three or four hundred years old. I do not deny but that you can build an earth dam, but I do deny that there is any reason to suppose that you can maintain a dam on that character of a foundation.

A few years ago in France a dam was built upon what they said was solid rock. It was a dam considerably less in height than this. It stood for a number of years, and then it went out. It was a masonry dam, and five or six hundred feet went out at a single time.

Forty years ago, or thereabouts, I should say—and I speak only from recollection; it may not have been more than thirty, for I have not looked it up—the city of Bristol, in Great Britain, built a dam for city water. It had stood a number of years, and then it suddenly went out, to the great destruction of property and a considerable destruction of life. The best engineering talent of Europe was called and sat there for weeks and months to determine the defect in the dam. They unanimously reported, when they got through, that all the highest engineering talent had been displayed in the building of the dam and that they could find no reason whatever why the dam went out; but there was the patent fact that it had gone.

So, Mr. President, you can not depend upon a dam, not even if it is made of the best material. No man can say whether a dam will be safe or not, and any man who thinks, without knowing all the facts connected with its foundation, simply guesses as to what it will do.

Mr. President, I suppose most of us remember the Johnstown flood. I understand the fault about that; and I am not going to say that the same trouble which grew out of the Johnstown dam is likely to grow out of this dam if built at Gatun. I think it is very doubtful whether there will ever be a flood big enough to fill up this dam to such an extent that the water will go over the top. But if it ever should do so, that would be the end of the dam. If a waterway as big as my arm should find its way under that dam, with that great pressure on it, it would go as certainly as if hundreds of cubic feet went over the top.

At Johnstown the dam had stood for many years. Suddenly it went out with a great flood. There was no core built up. No earth dam ever built ought to have been built without a core in it, a cement core, a stone core, or something of that kind. Looking over the reports of the engineers, I find that they say if there had been a core in that dam when the water that went over the dam struck the core the dam would have held it and the disaster would not have occurred.

Mr. President, this is a case where when you come to build a dam you should build it in such a way that there is no possibility of its going out. The Chagres River, which is being considered and must be considered in connection with this enterprise, has in the last thirty years had some tremendous floods. It had a flood some years ago such as has not occurred since and may not occur in a hundred years. The floods are somewhat like earthquakes. They come when you do not expect them. But yet when you build a dam of that kind, upon which the whole character of your canal rests, there should be no possibility of its going out. That river might rise double what it has for the last twenty years and produce twice as much water. The dam must be built with reference to that. You must prepare against a possibility and not a probability.

Mr. President, some of the best engineers in the world have declared that it is recklessness to build a dam at Gatun. The Senator from New Jersey yesterday spoke of Mr. Hunter with some criticism. He said Mr. Hunter had been in favor of the new French lock canal. He was given this question to determine: "You must find for us a canal that we can build within eight years, and you must devise a canal that we can build with the money that we can probably raise." So he said the lock canal was the best under the circumstances. I have here somewhere Mr. Hunter's letter. I am not going to read it, but I wish Senators who want to know something about this subject would send for Document No. 456 of the Fifty-ninth Congress, the present session. In that document there is a statement made by Mr. Hunter. I know no reason why Mr. Hunter should misstate anything in connection with this matter. It is a letter that he writes addressed to the Senator from Alabama, who has given much attention, as all know, to this question for the last twenty-odd years. I wish Senators would read Mr. Hunter's letter.

Mr. President, looking at the clock I discover that I am not keeping my pledge that I was going to make a short speech, but I will practically quit. I want to say only a few words more. If we build this canal, every impulse of our American spirit ought to require us to build the best canal that can be built. I am not enthusiastic about it. I can not see the benefit that will come to the American people by building it that some of you do. But I am enough of an American to feel that I would rather we would sacrifice that extra hundred million dollars—nay, I would rather you would sacrifice the entire cost of the canal than that you should build a canal which the business men of the world would condemn.

I am not afraid of bankrupting this Government. I know our expenses are great, but our income is great, and if we choose to borrow the money to build this canal we can borrow it cheaper than any other people in the world.

If we have to build this canal, let us build it not looking simply to the question of its cost, but what will be the type that shall meet the demands of the world now and for all time to come. If it pays, well and good. If it does not pay, let us contribute like men to the world's advantage. At least we will have the satisfaction of knowing that when we commenced a great enterprise we concluded it in a way to be creditable to the American nation.

There are a hundred things which might be said about this canal that I thought I could say in less time than I have been speaking, and that I should like to say under other conditions than those which now exist here at the close of the session.

Mr. President, I want to say a few words on another point, though I dislike to criticise anybody. In the early part of this session we had questions of salaries and criticisms of conduct of officials. I want to repeat what I said one day in the Senate.

The engineering questions of this canal are settled. There is enough engineering experience now to know what you want to do and how to do it. What you want now down on the Isthmus is a man who can organize the labor and carry it on and do it. There will be difficulty in getting that kind of man, I know. We had a man there, Mr. Wallace, from whom I intended to quote some things he said about the canal if I had had the time. Mr. Wallace is not only an engineer, but an executive man. I do not think, as the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] thinks, that he is so prejudiced that his testimony is not to be taken into consideration. We had him there on the Isthmus.

Mr. President, here have been the headquarters of the canal. Here are the headquarters of the canal now. The superintendent is here; Mr. Shonts is here; Mr. Stevens is here. I admit they are engaged. They have been traveling around the country telling us what kind of a canal we ought to have. I suppose they will continue to draw these immense salaries of theirs, salaries that I do not complain of if they will go on the Isthmus and attend to their business. But when a man is drawing in two months or less as much as I draw in a year for my services here, common decency requires that he should be where, in my judgment, his duties properly call him.

I do not believe that you can build this canal from here. There has been nothing done on the canal since the 1st day of last August that amounts to anything at all. How long will it be before there will be more done?

Now, Mr. President, I am not making haste. I notice that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] said it would take twenty years to build a sea-level canal. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN] simply raised it five years, and said it would take twenty-five years. The minority said it would take fifteen years. I presume the committee of our body knows better what it would take than even the Commission, who are so confident that they know best what kind of a canal we are to have.

Mr. HOPKINS. I may not have understood the Senator correctly. The Commission said it would take twenty years.

Mr. TELLER. What the Commission said was fifteen years.

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, no; let me correct the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. You can not correct it, because my statement is correct. I think I can turn to it in a minute.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Commission say twenty years. I know the Senator is wrong.

Mr. TELLER. I do not care myself whether it is fifteen years or twenty years, only I thought it was hardly fair——

Mr. HOPKINS. I only wanted to correct the Senator, as a matter of fact. The Senator will find, if he looks at it, that the minority report of engineers fixed it at fifteen years, and the Commission, when they examined it, fixed it at twenty.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator refer to the Canal Commission?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, I did not mean the Canal Commission. There are some members of that Commission whose judgment would be worth something, but we submitted this question to a board of engineers noted for their ability. Eight of them said that it could be done in twelve or thirteen years. The others said it could be done in fifteen years.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is right.

Mr. TELLER. That is what I am talking about.

Now, Mr. President, I doubt myself whether it can be done in twelve or thirteen years, and I should be surprised if the lock type of canal does not take twelve or thirteen years.

I might spend a little time to show how long it will take to build these locks. As I have said before, there have been no such locks built in the history of mankind. No engineer can tell how long it will take. The locks must be built with care. There is not a man who has given any attention to these questions who does not know that you can build a lock that will not have half the resisting strength if you hasten it and build it carelessly. The amount of time necessary to solidify and prepare it for use is considerable. When the locks are done, when the last mechanic leaves them, there ought not to be a drop of water put in the locks for the next twelve or eighteen months. That is the way the whole body, 3,000 feet in length, with its two flights of locks, may become homogeneous, and it will not be homogeneous if you begin to use it immediately after it is completed.

Safety is worth more than time to us in this matter. After all, the question is, What is the best canal we can build? I think everybody will admit that we ought to have the best. Nobody is willing to deny that, and yet we hear that a better canal can be built if you put in locks than if you cut a waterway clear across the Isthmus.

Now, Mr. President, I have taken more time than I had intended to take, and I am very sure I have taken more time than was profitable to the Senate; yet I should like to take up—and I would do it if it was the beginning of the session—these several items. I would show the difficulty and the danger in every step that the minority propose. I believe it can be demonstrated before the American people, as it was demonstrated before the board of engineers, tht the only safe canal is a sea-level canal.

Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey dwelt with considerable force upon the fact that one more American engineer had declared for a lock canal than had declared for a sea-level canal. Nationality does not give men brains nor judgment. While I am proud of American achievements, I take off my hat to many an engineer who never put a foot upon American soil—engineers who have solved the greatest questions that ever interested the engineering world.

You will find on American soil to-day engineers whose voices have not been heard on this question who are as capable as any man of the minority or of the majority, and they stand with me that it should be a sea-level canal. I will arrange on my side of this controversy every practical shipowner and shipmaster of this country, without exception. I challenge you to find a single shipmaster who will ever tell you that a lock canal is better than a sea-level canal. He will protest from a practical standpoint that it is not safe to put a great ship in a lock.

Mr. President, I want to say one or two words on one other proposition. When this canal is built you will have to meet the competition of the Suez Canal; you will have to meet the competition of the transcontinental routes; you will have to meet the competition of the line recently built across the Tehuantepec Peninsula.

I have on my table here a statement made by an engineer whom I will put against any engineer who has been connected with this matter, and that is Mr. Wallace. I have Mr. Wallace's statement as to what the Tehuantepec Canal can do by way of carrying freight across that canal, the ship unloading it in the Gulf harbor, the railroad taking it from the ship in the Gulf harbor and putting it again on the ship in the Pacific harbor.

Mr. President, you will have to lower your tariff on the canal. That railroad across there can carry a ton of freight, taking it from the ship and putting it on the other side, for less than you propose to charge for carrying it across the Isthmus on this canal when it shall be completed. You will have to meet that, Mr. President. You will have to meet other competitors. You will have to meet in the next fifteen years five or six more transcontinental lines. Therefore, if you mean to make a financial success of this enterprise you must secure the business of the world, at least the business of the world that goes to the Pacific sea.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, if he will permit me, in connection with the mention of the Tehuantepec route, I want to state a fact which is probably not as well known to the public now as it was twenty or thirty years ago. There is in the Navy Department now on file a most interesting report of the commission that was appointed to survey the Tehuantepec route. The profiles and the estimated cost and the practicability of the work are all set out in detail.

For myself, while I never made any effort on that line, because I realized that it would be useless in view of the consensus of opinion in favor of the more southern route, I have always been of the opinion that the best route for a transcontinental canal which could be adopted was the Tehuantepec route, with 40 miles of a navigable river sufficient for the floating of very large vessels. There are 40 miles of that river, the name of which I have forgotten. It is a Mexican name.

I do not know whether or not the business of the world is going to develop to the extent which would justify more than one canal, but if it does, in my opinion the time may come when that will be the most formidable rival that we shall have for the business of an isthmian canal between the two oceans.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, at the risk of extending my remarks somewhat longer than I intended, I want to say that a good many years ago I examined this question pretty thoroughly in connection with the late St. Louis engineer, Mr. Eads, who considered that question in connection with the canal and also in connection with a ship railway. I had the pleasure of a personal acquaintance for many years with Mr. Eads, whom I regarded at the time of his death as the greatest engineer on American soil. He was the man who built the jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi River, a project condemned by every American officer and engineer of the Army, and condemned by a very large proportion of the American engineers on this continent. On his guaranty the Government agreed to pay a large amount of money for putting those jetties into operation, and the work proved to be a great success. Mr. Eads was the engineer who built the great steel bridge at St. Louis, a bridge which I suppose everybody here, more or less, has crossed over. He devised a system of railroad tracks on which to haul a ship out of the water and drop it into the water on the other side of the Isthmus. I am not certain but that, if he had lived, he would have carried out that plan. I know engineers differed as to whether or not that plan was feasible. While his plan was not by any means so satisfactory for handling ships as a canal would be, yet he could have carried a ship across the Isthmus in that way. There would have been the same liability to accident in that method of transporting ships as there will be in carrying ships through the canal. But, Mr. President, the place for the ship is in the sea or in the river; it is not on the land. When a ship gets out of water it is like a fish when it gets out of water. The fish is not at home, and neither is the ship, and both are liable to all sorts of accidents. While I was a great admirer of Mr. Eads, I always had my doubts as to whether his was as wise a plan as the plan of crossing the Isthmus by a canal.

We have had various routes selected for a ship canal. I am not at this hour certain that we have selected the best place for such a canal to cross the Isthmus. The only question as to whether Darien is the best place is as to whether or not the mountains, which in the prosecution of such a project have to be tunneled, are granite. Nobody knows to-day whether or not they are granite.

We have gone into the construction of this canal without much thought and practically without much knowledge. I am afraid, Mr. President, when we get through with it, we shall feel that we have made a mistake. I do not want a further mistake made when we build a lock canal because we can build it in somewhat less time than we can a sea-level canal.

All I can say, in conclusion, is, that I wish Senators who are to vote on this subject would look into it and study it, and if they have any partisan feeling about it—I do not mean political partisanship, but I mean if they feel they are committed to one canal or the other, I hope they will feel free to consider it and determine between this session and the next session—for, of course, I am confident we are not going to dispose of this matter by any vote we may give here—so that we may settle this question in such manner that the nations of the earth will be satisfied with our effort to accomplish what for the last four hundred years has been considered more or less by the whole world.

Mr. President, this is a great enterprise. It can bring to us much credit and great glory, and it can bring to us much discredit and disgrace if we build a canal which ought not to be built.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President, if no other Senator desires at this time to address the Senate upon the unfinished business, I ask unanimous consent that it may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FLINT in the chair). In the absence of objection, the unfinished business will be laid aside temporarily.

LAKE ERIE AND OHIO RIVER SHIP CANAL.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, under the unanimous consent agreement obtained last evening, I now ask that the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal bill be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (H. R. 14396) to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, to define the powers thereof, and to facilitate interstate commerce.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on agreeing to the first amendment of the bill as it has been amended.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Montana. Before the Senator from Georgia proceeds, I wish to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BACON. I will state that I do not want the roll called on my account.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allee	Daniel	Kittredge	Penrose
Ankeny	Dillingham	Knox	Perkins
Bacon	Dolliver	La Follette	Pettus
Berry	Dubois	Long	Scott
Blackburn	Flint	McCumber	Simmons
Brandegee	Foraker	McLaurin	Smoot
Bulkeley	Foster	Mallory	Spooner
Burkett	Frazier	Millard	Stone
Burnham	Fulton	Morgan	Sutherland
Carter	Hansbrough	Nelson	Teller
Clark, Mont.	Hemenway	Overman	Warner
Culberson	Kean	Patterson	Warren

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. BACON. I regret, Mr. President, that I was not permitted to finish the remarks I was proceeding to make upon this question when the bill was previously before the Senate, and I particularly regret that so much time has elapsed since then that it is difficult to resume and have the matter which I shall cover to-day directly connected with and relating to that which I endeavored to cover on the former occasion.

I regard this, Mr. President, as a very grave question, not simply with respect to the particular measure now before the Senate, although that is a very grave one, but also in respect of the precedent that it sets as the beginning of what will be a most marked departure, if we shall continue to follow it, and, as I shall endeavor to show, one of very wide and far-reaching consequences in the future business of this Government and the relations between the General Government and the States.

Of course I am not going to elaborate these great questions, for they are great enough to elicit not only all that I might say, but all that might be properly said by a great many other Senators much more capable of dealing with this important question than I am.

I will not attempt, of course, Mr. President, to repeat what I said on the former occasion, or even to make a synopsis of it. I will simply state, in order that the connection may be preserved, that I had endeavored to present to the Senate some reasons why this was not a proper piece of legislation for the United States Congress; that the creation of a corporation by Congress should be limited to the creation of such corporations as are required for the performance of great governmental functions, or for the performance of functions which corporations created by the States can not perform.

I had called attention to the proposition that even conceding—which we must do under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States—the fact that a corporation which is intended to subserve the purposes of interstate commerce is one which justifies Congress in the chartering of a corporation to be thus engaged, at the same time that was not the character of corporation which should be so chartered if that were the sole function to be performed and if that function could be as well performed by some State corporation. In that connection, I had called attention to the fact that doubtless an act chartering a corporation of this kind, in which it is recited, as it is in this proposed charter, that it is for the purpose of performing a governmental function, would be held by the Supreme Court of the United States to be a constitutional enactment. This would be so held, because the Supreme Court would not go behind the action of Congress to question the sincerity of Congress or to question whether or not that expression was inserted simply for the purpose of saving it from the condemnation of unconstitutionality on the part of the courts of the United States when they come to pass upon that question. The Supreme Court would not go behind that, and however insincere Congress might be in that recitation, however well known it might be that the purpose of that recitation was to save it from unconstitutionality, the Supreme Court would not undertake so to say.

I had stated to the Senate the proposition that when it came to the responsibility of Congress in the enactment of such a law, there was a high duty upon Congress to consider and determine the question whether or not the purpose was in fact and in truth to subserve some great governmental function which could not be equally subserved by a corporation created by a State; and that if, in the exercise of our duty, it was our opinion that the purpose was not to create a corporation for the performance of some governmental function that a State corporation could not equally well perform, even though we might be satisfied that the Supreme Court would hold such a law constitutional, our high constitutional duty was to carry out and make effective the spirit and intent and purpose of this constitutional restriction. In that connection I had quoted the very marked utterance of Mr. Webster in his argument in the great case of Gibbons v. Ogden, where he was contending for the exclusive power of the United States Government in that particular instance where the right to exclusive power in a matter which related to interstate commerce was called in question, and where the right to concurrent power on the part of the State of New York was contended for by the other side. Webster, while maintaining the authority of the United States and the right of the United States and the duty of the United States to control exclusively all matters which essentially and necessarily relate to interstate commerce, recognized that Congress should draw the line in legislation affecting the internal affairs of the States in such way as to preserve the exercise of their proper functions by the States.

That utterance of Mr. Webster was in response to the contention of those who represented the right of the State of New York to exercise concurrent authority in this matter. This was the contention on the part of those representing New York: That if it be true that the simple fact that a matter referred to interstate commerce vested exclusive power over it in the Congress of the United States and there was no concurrent power in the State, the conclusion necessarily followed that it not only related to that particular instance involving the right to control interstate commerce, but that it necessarily extended to every corporation or every agency which could be created or which might have part in the carrying on of interstate commerce. Mr. Webster replies to that by the statement which I have previously read, which is the pith of that part of his argument, that that conclusion was not a necessary sequitur: that it did not necessarily follow; but that while those matters which were essential in interstate commerce and so essential that they could not be performed by the States or by corporations created by the States, and that for the States to attempt such performance would cause confusion and conflict, still a reasonable construction must be given to the Constitution—such a construction as, while it preserved the power of the United States, would still protect and recognize and respect the rights and powers of the States in the performance of their legitimate and proper functions.

I will not go over again, Mr. President, the argument which I endeavored to submit upon that question when I addressed the Senate two days ago upon this subject. My purpose to-day is to conclude what I had in mind on the former occasion in bringing to the attention of the Senate some of the practical consequences of our departure from this well-recognized rule and practice of more than a hundred years; for, while it is true that in some noted instances there has been a chartering of corporations by Congress for the purpose of interstate commerce, in most of those instances—the noted ones—the circumstances were peculiar and did come within the rule as laid down by Mr. Webster. I read from 91 United States Reports, where, in speaking of the circumstances under which Congress had chartered transcontinental railways, the court shows the peculiar circumstances which justified Congress in departing from the well-recognized practice which left to the States the chartering of these railway companies. I will take the liberty of reading it again in order that the connection may be kept up with what I am about to say. Referring to this act, the incorporation of a transcontinental railway, the Supreme Court, in the case of the United States v. The Union Pacific Railroad, in 91 United States, says:

> The act, as has been stated, was passed in the midst of war, when the means for national defense were deemed inadequate, and the public mind was alive to the necessity of uniting by iron bands the destiny of the Pacific and Atlantic States.

And again in the same paragraph:

> But vast as was the work, limited as were the private resources to build it, the growing wants as well as the existing and future military necessities of the country demanded that it be completed.

Mr. McLAURIN. From what case is the Senator reading?

Mr. BACON. The case of the United States v. Union Pacific Railway Company, in 91 United States Reports.

An additional fact which is alluded to in the decision, and which is known to us all, is that at the time of the chartering of that railroad possibly nine-tenths, certainly four-fifths, of that line of proposed railway lay across the public domain of the United States, then comparatively an unsettled, wild country.

It is true, Mr. President, that there can be found upon the statute book instances where some minor corporations have been chartered by the United States Government which would not by reason of any particular necessity for them measure up to the importance of these transcontinental railways which were thus chartered by the United States Government; but we know the fact that sometimes charters of that kind go through nem. con., nobody noticing particularly, whereas if they were challenged, possibly they would not have gone through. However, I think it may be asserted as a fact that in the long course of the legislation of this Government the general rule has been recognized that the chartering of corporations, even where within the law of constitutional right, has been limited to cases where such corporations were essential to the performance of governmental functions and where the performance of those governmental functions could not be as satisfactorily accomplished by corporations chartered by the States. The question is, Mr. President, whether we are to adhere to that recognized practice, even where we have the constitutional right to go beyond, or whether we will go beyond and open all the great consequences which must inevitably flow from such a departure on our part.

Before I conclude I intend to call attention to some of the features in regard to this charter, and then I will probably have a little more to say as to the question of the consequences which are to flow from this proposed action on the part of Congress if that action is to be taken as a precedent and followed hereafter.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. Always, with pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator, I suppose, has no doubt that the Government could build this canal itself?

Mr. BACON. None whatever, and I would infinitely prefer that the Government should do it rather than it should grant this charter to a company. I would very much prefer that the Government should do it, and I will give my reason before I get through.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Government might build it itself, of course it can exercise its constitutional right to choose the means by which it shall be built?

Mr. BACON. I do not dispute the constitutional right, so far as the question would be decided by a court to be or not to be constitutional.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me until I finish my sentence, then I will yield with pleasure. But I say when Senators come to legislate they are not to be limited in the discharge of their duties to the simple question whether or not the court will decide a thing to be or not to be constitutional, but that the high duty rests upon the legislator not only to limit himself to such matters as in his opinion will not be within the condemnation of the courts for unconstitutionality, but to limit himself to legislation which, in his opinion, is in accordance with the intent and purpose and practical design of the Constitution, even though when he goes beyond that it may be in a case where the court itself would not interfere. Now I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Wisconsin seem agreed that the Government of the United States may itself construct a canal between States. Without expressing any opinion myself upon that question, I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia upon what provision of the Constitution he rests that power.

Mr. BACON. I would rest it probably upon the same provision that I would rest the right to construct the Panama Canal—a matter of importance to the Government in military defense, or in various ways; the improvement of the commerce of the country; in the same way and for the same reason that the Government improves a harbor or anything of that kind. I think it would be legitimate.

Mr. MALLORY. In other words, the Senator would put it on the ground that it was a governmental function.

Mr. BACON. Yes; the performance of a governmental function.

Mr. CULBERSON. But the Government of the United States is one of limited powers. Those powers are supposed to be enumerated in the Constitution. It would be a legislative act to authorize the construction of a canal, and I simply made this inquiry in order to invite an expression of opinion from the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Wisconsin as to what specific authority there is in the Constitution for the Government itself to build and construct a railroad or to construct a canal.

If the Senator will pardon me, in a sovereign State that power is the essence of sovereignty, and it may do anything which its own constitution does not prohibit. But the Government of the United States is one of limited and enumerated powers, and if you undertake to say the Government of the United States may do this or that, then the question is, Where is the authority for it found in the Constitution?

Mr. BACON. Where does the Senator from Texas get the power for the Government to spend millions and hundreds of millions in building works in rivers to improve navigation?

Mr. CULBERSON. I have simply sought to invite an expression of opinion of the Senators who have announced themselves on this particular question.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to ask a question?

Mr. BACON. I must yield to one Senator at a time, and I now yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania. Then I will yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KNOX. Thanking the Senator from Georgia for the courtesy, I should like to answer the question propounded to the Senator from Georgia by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BACON. If I may do so, without the act being misconstrued, I will sit down while the Senator speaks, because I shall be very glad to hear from the Senator from Pennsylvania not only briefly, but at length.

Mr. KNOX. It will be for only a moment.

Mr. BACON. I am not objecting at all.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to answer in the language of the Supreme Court in a recent case, decided in 1893, in view of the history of this class of legislation. I refer to the case of Luxton v. North River Bridge Company, 153 United States:

> It can not at the present day be doubted that Congress, under the power to regulate commerce among the several States, as well as to provide for postal accommodations and military exigencies, had authority to pass these laws.

This is speaking now of the law granting a charter for a bridge to be constructed across the Hudson River between New Jersey and New York.

> The power to construct or to authorize individuals or corporations to construct national highways and bridges from State to State is essential to the complete control and regulation of interstate commerce. Without authority in Congress to establish and maintain such highways and bridges it would be without authority to regulate one of the most important adjuncts of commerce. This power in former times was exerted to a very limited extent, the Cumberland, or National, road being the most notable instance.

The court goes on further, but I picked that out as being concrete.

Mr. BACON. I have that case before me.

Mr. NELSON and Mr. PATTERSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to ask the Senator from Texas under what constitutional power he justifies the right of the Government to appropriate money for the construction of a canal at Port Arthur, wholly within the State of Texas, and also to appropriate money for canalizing Buffalo Bayou? Under what paragraph of the Constitution does he find warrant and authority for those appropriations for works wholly within the State of Texas?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I promised to yield next to the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Texas to answer the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Acting upon the courtesy of the Senator from Georgia, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that he takes the question I put to the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Wisconsin rather too seriously. I expressed no dissent to that proposition myself, expressly stating that I would reserve my opinion. But I wanted to hear from those gentlemen.

Now, in the speech I made on the rate bill I stated that whether the power to regulate included the power to construct, and whether the Government of the United States, being one of limited and enumerated powers, could construct and operate railroads the same as a government of general sovereignty rather than of limited sovereignty could do, was a question unnecessary to be determined. I am disposed to believe that if the Government of the United States can construct and operate railroads and canals at all, it must be rested upon the authority to regulate interstate commerce.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] read a decision by the Supreme Court of the United States, which was based, I believe, upon an act of Congress authorizing the construction of a bridge over a navigable stream between two States, and he read the language of the decision to the effect that Congress had not only power to grant such authority to others, but the power to construct such works. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania conclude from that decision that the right and power exist in the Government to construct, own, and operate railways, as well as the works used by other common carriers, extending through several States?

Mr. KNOX. If I may be permitted in the time of the Senator from Georgia——

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I will say that the language I read, while it is found in the report of the case in which the question was raised as to the validity of legislation authorizing the construction of the North River Bridge, was taken from the opinion of Mr. Justice Bradley in California v. The Pacific Railroad. So the court itself answers the question propounded by the Senator from Colorado, which is, Can the United States authorize the construction of a railroad? Speaking of the validity of that act, which did authorize the construction of a railroad, the court says:

> The power to construct, or to authorize individuals or corporations to construct, national highways and bridges from State to State is essential to the complete control and regulation of interstate commerce.

It cites a notable case, with which we are all familiar, I especially so, having been born on the line of the road, that of the Cumberland, or National, road, which was constructed by Congress, running from this city, and which was intended to go to Cincinnati, but at Indianapolis was overtaken by the development of the railroads.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator has not given us his view. He reiterates the views of the Supreme Court of the United States in connection with that act of Congress, and then refers to the construction of the National road.

Mr. KNOX. It is from——

Mr. PATTERSON. Let me ask the Senator categorically whether it is his opinion, based upon the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, that the Government may construct and own and operate railroads throughout the United States?

Mr. KNOX. My opinion of the powers of the Federal Government under the Constitution is based upon the opinions of the Supreme Court, and I have not the slightest doubt that the Supreme Court decided that question in the way I read. If that is not a satisfactory answer, and if it were a question of individual opinion, which of course must be based upon the opinions of the court, I have not the slightest doubt about it.

Mr. PATTERSON. That it has the power?

Mr. KNOX. It has.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, this is a most interesting question, and one of the class which I wish our lawmakers were more in the habit of considering—these limitations. I have no question, I repeat—I have said it several times—that this act would be declared constitutional under the decisions of the Supreme Court, broadly announcing the doctrine as those decisions have, that any charter enacted by Congress in which there should be a recitation of the purpose to facilitate interstate commerce would be declared by the court to be constitutional. I repeat, however, that that is not the rule by which we are to be guided in the enactment of a charter, unless we are prepared to say that we will in practice follow the rule and charter all corporations which are to engage in interstate commerce and which may so claim and apply to us to be so chartered.

I suppose no one will dispute the fact that if we were to do so, there would be an immense revolution in the business of this country and in the relation of the States to that business and the corresponding relation of the General Government to that business. I am going to have a little more to say about that somewhat later, and I simply pass that point now for the purpose of emphasizing the proposition that in determining whether a charter shall be granted it is not simply the question whether or not an act incorporating a company will be decided by the courts to be constitutional, unless we are prepared to go to the extent of saying that we are ready to charter all corporations which are going to be engaged in interstate commerce, because all of them would be held by the Supreme Court to be constitutional.

But while they would be so held to be constitutional, would it be consistent with our duty to go to that extent and charter all corporations engaged in interstate commerce in the United States, or should we in the exercise of our duty and our high constitutional obligation follow the suggestion of Mr. Webster, which I have twice quoted—I am applying what he said substantially in the matter of what ought to be our duty—that we should, in determining whether or not a certain charter should be granted, be guided by the great rule, is it necessary for the performance of a governmental function, which function can not be as well performed by a charter granted by a State? In every case where that function can not be as well performed by a corporation chartered by a State, then there is the strongest reason why we should exercise the power.

Mr. President, I am going to pass from that point immediately, because I propose to return to it a little later, when I shall make a little more practical illustration of the view which I take of our duty in regard to that matter. In regard to this particular charter, I say it will not be a corporation which will be discharging any great governmental function which could not be equally well discharged by a corporation chartered by the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio. I say the purpose of the canal is not the performance of a great governmental function. The simple fact that great interstate commerce will pass over it will not bring it within that category, unless we are prepared to go further and say that all carriers over which interstate commerce passes are performing a governmental function, and that an equal obligation rests upon us to give a Federal charter to every great railroad or steamboat or steamship company engaged in interstate commerce over which great interstate commerce is to flow.

In the second place, I say conceding all that is said by the learned Senators from Pennsylvania, who have both addressed the Senate on this subject, as to the vast importance of the construction of this work and the great benefits which will flow therefrom and the great evil which will result from the failure to construct the canal, our refusal to grant this charter will not prevent the construction of the canal, and that immediately.

I hold in my hand a pamphlet which has been laid on the desk of every Senator, in regard to this enterprise. I suppose the fact of the authenticity of every statement in it can be accepted by us from the fact that the pamphlet comes from those who are interested in the procurement of the charter. Each Senator, if he has not disposed of it, has a copy of this pamphlet upon his desk, and on page 29 he will find the fact stated that the authority to build this canal has already been given by the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio. This pamphlet professes to be the proceedings had at a meeting in Pittsburg on November 29, 1904, in which there were addresses delivered by several eminent men, among them Mr. DALZELL, at present a Member of the House of Representatives, and Mr. John E. Shaw, who I take, from the allusions made to him and from the speech itself, to be a prominent citizen of Pittsburg, one fully authorized to speak with regard to that enterprise, because he seems to have been one of the most active men in its advocacy and proposed prosecution.

First I will read from page 24 of this pamphlet, where, under the subhead "History of the ship-canal project," he says:

In 1889 the legislature of Pennsylvania appointed a commission to inquire into the practicability of such a waterway, and appropriated $10,000 for their use.

I will not read further from that part now. I will turn to that later, and I will now resume where I first proposed to read, from page 29, under the subhead "Canal can be built at once." In his speech Mr. Shaw stated this at that meeting:

The provisional committee, after their exhaustive examination of the matter, and realizing what a tremendous bulwark it would be in both maintaining and protecting Pittsburg's commerce and trade, and her mining and manufacturing industries, proceeded a step further to clear the decks, so that the canal could become a reality.

I hope every Senator will listen to what I am going to read, and I wish every Senator who is going to vote on this question were in his seat to hear it:

The route adopted as being the most economical in construction, and serving the largest commercial interests, lies about one-half in Pennsylvania and one-half in Ohio.

The committee procured a general law to be enacted in Pennsylvania, authorizing a ship canal company to be organized to construct and operate a ship canal from the headwaters of the Ohio River via the Beaver and Mahoning rivers to the Ohio State line.

A similar law was passed in the Ohio legislature authorizing a ship canal company to construct and operate a ship canal from Ashtabula on Lake Erie to the Pennsylvania State line on the Mahoning River, and authority was given in both States to consolidate their franchises at the State line and operate a through canal from the Ohio River to Lake Erie by one company.

Now, there is not only the separate authority given by the State of Pennsylvania and by the State of Ohio for the construction of this canal within the limits of the particular State. Here is a reciprocal piece of legislation by the two States, that they may meet at the State line and consolidate as one company to construct and operate this canal.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. It is very obvious that there has been no attempt to conceal that fact. Otherwise the pamphlets would not have been laid on the desks.

Mr. BACON. No; of course there is no intention to suggest any such purpose to conceal——

Mr. KNOX. I wish the Senator would read the next paragraph. It indicates why they ought to have a national charter.

Mr. BACON. I have no doubt reasons can be suggested.

Mr. KNOX. There is no dispute about that.

Mr. BACON. I am speaking of the fact that, so far as the prosecution of this work is concerned, they have every authority and power now to proceed with its construction, and that a failure on the part of Congress to charter it will not interfere with the construction of the work. It goes on upon the next page—I will read it if the Senator desires I should in this connection:

The committee went a step further, realizing that this canal was but a short connecting link between the waterway systems of the Great Lakes and the Ohio and Mississippi rivers under the control of the Federal Government, which would sooner or later be taken over by the Government and made a part of the Federal waterway system, even if primarily built by a private corporation, introduced a bill in Congress asking for power under a national charter to a corporation to build this canal.

That was an assumption, of course, as to the fact that the Government of the United States will ultimately take it over. I presume none of us will admit that as being correct. I suppose I could state it as a fact, for I understand it to be the fact, that when this proposition was first presented in the other House it failed of passage in a previous Congress. But I am simply now discussing the question whether or not the granting of the charter is essential to the prosecution of this work, even if we concede all that is said as to its great importance and its essential character. Evidently it is not. There could not be a more complete piece of legislation on the part of two States to authorize the construction and operation and maintenance of the canal than there already has been both by the State of Pennsylvania and the State of Ohio.

Mr. President, I want to ask the attention of the Senators present to a consideration of what are the evil consequences which are to flow from the doing of this unnecessary thing in the granting of this charter. In the first place, I called attention on a previous occasion to the fact that when a charter is granted by the Federal Government the States have no power to tax the franchise. The taxing of a franchise I believe is of modern development, but franchises have come to be recognized as a very important part of the taxable property of the corporation. When the Federal Government exercises its power and goes into a State and charters a company, even though under the law all the visible property of that company is subject to taxation, the franchise, an important part of the taxable property of that corporation when created by the United States, ceases to be taxable by the State. While of course we all recognize the truth of that proposition, I want to read what the Supreme Court of the United States said in a case in 127 United States, California v. Pacific Railroad Company, where the question before the court was whether or not a State had the right to tax the franchise of a corporation which had been created under a charter granted by the Federal Government. The court says this:

Taxation is a burden, and may be laid so heavily as to destroy the thing taxed or render it valueless. As Chief Justice Marshall said in McCulloch v. Maryland, "the power to tax involves the power to destroy." Recollecting the fundamental principle that the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States are the supreme law of the land, it seems to us almost absurd to contend that a power given to a person or corporation by the United States may be subjected to taxation by a State. The power conferred emanates from, and is a portion of, the power of the government that confers it. To tax it is not only derogatory to the dignity, but subversive of the powers of the government and repugnant to its paramount sovereignty. It is unnecessary to cite cases on this subject. The principles laid down by the court in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat., 316; Osborn v. The Bank of the United States, 9 Wheat., 738, and Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 419; and in numerous cases since which have followed in their lead, abundantly sustain the views we have expressed.

Mr. President, it may be a small matter that in one particular instance the United States Government will charter a corporation in a State and thus deprive the State of a very valuable part of what should constitute the taxable property of a State, but if we are to have this as a precedent and to go further and charter all corporations engaged in interstate commerce, it can be seen at once what an immense influence it must have upon the revenues derived from taxation in a State.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BACON. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. PATTERSON. Should the act creating the corporation expressly grant to the State the right to tax the franchises of such a corporation within the State, might not then the franchises be taxed by the several Commonwealths?

Mr. BACON. In the case I have just quoted, I will say in answer to the inquiry of the learned Senator from Colorado, the court indirectly recognized that power. But the language used by the court shows how inconsistent they consider it with the dignity and power of the United States Government to delegate any such power to a State.

I will read——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment until I finish the reply to the Senator, I will yield to him with pleasure. The Senator will recall that in the paragraph which I just read from this decision these words occur:

Taxation is a burden, and may be laid so heavily as to destroy the thing taxed or render it valueless. As Chief Justice Marshall said in McCulloch v. Maryland, "the power to tax involves the power to destroy." Recollecting the fundamental principle that the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States are the supreme law of the land, it seems to us almost absurd to contend that a power given to a person or corporation by the United States may be subjected to taxation by a State. The power conferred emanates from and is a portion of the power of the Government that confers it. To tax it is not only derogatory to the dignity, but subversive of the powers of the Government and repugnant to its paramount sovereignty.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. So, if the Senator from Minnesota will pardon me a minute, even if the right does exist and if Congress should confer the right, it would be in conflict with what the Supreme Court designates as the "dignity" and "prerogative" and "sovereignty" of the Government; and even if, for the purpose of avoiding what they concede to be a hardship, Congress should incorporate that in a measure, these great corporations, which in the aggregate, all over the United States, would make an irresistible force, would have it in their power to come to Congress and get relief from this burden by securing amendments taking away any power granted to the States to tax these franchises.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BACON. I will yield. I said to the Senator I would yield to him.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to say to the Senator from Georgia that that is precisely what we have done in the case of the national banks. We allowed them to be taxed.

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. NELSON. That does not, as far as I know, derogate from the authority of the United States in any degree.

Mr. BACON. That is true, and we have gone further in the matter of national banks. We have also made them subject to the jurisdiction of local courts. But nevertheless the proposition is as I have stated it. The matter of banks, Mr. President, is different. The banking business of the country is of a different kind from the business of common carriers or from any other industrial enterprise. I will not stop to turn aside to illustrate what those differences may be.

Now, Mr. President, another result which flows from Congress going into the States and chartering their business enterprises is that it takes away from the jurisdiction of the State courts a settlement of the controversies between the people of those States and these corporations thus chartered and confers it all upon the courts of the General Government. It is a very grave question to my mind whether, under the constitutional provision which gives to the Federal courts the jurisdiction between certain citizens in cases arising under the laws of the United States, Congress can by any enactment take that jurisdiction away from the Federal courts in the case of a company chartered by Federal law and confer it exclusively upon the courts of the State.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. KNOX. The Senator from Georgia must surely know that that is exactly what Congress has done in respect to national banks.

Mr. BACON. I have just stated the fact that jurisdiction in such cases has been conferred on the State courts. The Senator was not listening.

Mr. KNOX. No; the Senator answered the question of the Senator from Minnesota on the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. BACON. I added, in response to the Senator from Minnesota, that the law had gone further and conferred jurisdiction upon local courts in regard to controversies involving United States banks.

Mr. KNOX. Then I think the Senator has answered his own doubt.

Mr. BACON. No; not necessarily. I have doubts very frequently, and I have no doubt the learned and distinguished Senator has, as to the correctness of legal propositions, even where they have been decided by the courts. I do not think I am misstating any fact in that case.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to call the attention of the Senator, if he will allow me, in connection with the point he last made, to the fact that in the judiciary act conferring jurisdiction on the circuit and district courts of the United States, the very language of the act is that those courts shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the courts of the several States, and under the bankruptcy act jurisdiction is left with the State courts.

Mr. BACON. Yes; that is true. I do not dispute that.

Mr. NELSON. That is the case under the Federal bankruptcy law. So there can be no difficulty in dividing the jurisdiction.

Mr. BACON. I am very much obliged to the learned Senator for calling my attention to facts as to these matters that of course we need to be reminded of, but which, I presume, every Senator present is fully aware of. That does not change the proposition that to my mind there is a doubt as to the correct construction of that section of the Constitution which gives jurisdiction to the courts of the United States in cases arising under the laws of the United States, as to whether or not the jurisdiction of the United States court can in any case be denied to one who has the right to claim it.

I do not mean to say, Mr. President, that the Congress can not give the right to a concurrent jurisdiction to one who claims anything under the laws of the United States, who may desire to go into the State court. The question upon which I have doubt is whether, where a case arises under the laws of the United States, one who claims a right to go into a Federal court can be denied it by reason of the fact that concurrent jurisdiction is given to a State court.

I wish the Senator from Pennsylvania or the Senator from Minnesota would show where the Supreme Court of the United States has ever decided that in such a case, where concurrent jurisdiction is thus given, it was not within the power of the party to claim his right under this constitutional provision, under the exercise of a right which had not been denied, when he asserted his right to be heard in a Federal court. If there is such a case let either of the Senators point it out.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. NELSON. Whenever a Federal question arises the statute provides for a transfer to the Federal courts, and even where a case is litigated in the State court when it finally reaches the supreme court of the State, if there is a Federal question involved it can be taken up to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. BACON. I had previously been well aware of the fact.

Mr. NELSON. It does not cut off the State courts from litigation. The matter can be reviewed in the Supreme Court of the United States, but in the first instance the State courts, the nisi prius court, and the supreme courts of the State have jurisdiction and try the case——

Mr. BACON. That is not the question.

Mr. NELSON. And the case goes up to the Supreme Court of the United States not because the lower courts have not had jurisdiction, but because there is a Federal question involved.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, I think we all must know that fact. We are all fully familiar with that rule of law. But that has nothing whatever to do with the proposition I am discussing.

Mr. NELSON. That law works in all other commercial and business transactions of the United States. Why can we not apply that same law and that same principle to the matter of the construction and operation of this canal?

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, the Senator is not on the point I am on at all, or else I clearly misunderstand him. The proposition which I make is one upon which I challenge the Senator from Pennsylvania, or the Senator from Minnesota either, to furnish a decision. If there be such a decision, then I bow to it, of course. It is this: In a case arising under the laws of the United States (which in the removal cases the Federal court says involves all cases arising under a charter granted by the Federal Government), where concurrent jurisdiction is vested by law both in the Federal and in the State courts, and where a party interested in a case arising under those laws claims a right and seeks to exercise the right to have his case tried in the Federal court, where has the Supreme Court of the United States ever held that he should be denied that right, and that the case must be brought in the State court because concurrent jurisdiction has been given by Congress to the State courts?

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. That is not denied. Is there anything in this bill which denies that right?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. KNOX. If the Senator from Georgia had not twice addressed me as the Senator from Pennsylvania and challenged me to produce an authority, I should not have interrupted him. But as I have not contended that there is any such decision I am not at all interested in searching the authorities to see whether I can find one.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon. Possibly I was a little too abrupt in my address to him. There was nothing certainly further from my mind than by word or manner to say or do anything in the least degree offensive, and if I was guilty of it, it was certainly without the slightest consciousness on my part. I judge from the Senator's reply that he did so consider it; and I beg of him to think otherwise, because there was nothing further from my intention.

Mr. KNOX. If I may be permitted, I will say I had not the slightest feeling about it, but it seemed to be so direct as to what the Senator regarded as authority upon that subject that, not recognizing the relevancy of the proposition to the bill before the Senate, I did not think it worth while to bother about it.

Mr. BACON. The relevancy, if the Senator will pardon me, is just this: I was speaking of one of the great evils which would result from the Federal Government entering upon the domain of granting charters to industrial enterprises of various kinds engaged in interstate commerce in the States; that as a consequence the State courts would be deprived of their jurisdiction.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment, I will then yield to him with pleasure. I have not finished the statement of the proposition. It had been suggested and stated both by the Senator from Pennsylvania and myself that to avoid an evil of that character in the case of the national banks concurrent jurisdiction had been given by the Federal statute in the State courts and in the Federal courts; and the Senator from Minnesota had gone further and instanced other classes of cases where there had been such concurrent jurisdiction granted by the Federal statute. My reply to that had been that it did not necessarily restore the exclusive jurisdiction to the State courts, for the reason that if the controversy arises under the laws of the United States, as every controversy will arise in a case where there has been a Federal charter, the party had his right under the Constitution to the jurisdiction of the Federal courts; and that even if the right of concurrent jurisdiction were admitted there could not be any denial to him of the Federal jurisdiction if he claimed it and insisted upon it. Thereupon it was that, possibly with too much earnestness, I suggested that if I were in error the Senator from Pennsylvania or the Senator from Minnesota would be able to produce an authority to the contrary. That I think, Mr. President, shows that it was extremely relevant to the question involved.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I hope the Senator will pardon me, Mr. President. I have not heard all the discussion on this immediate point, and probably what I am going to say is not altogether relevant, but I concluded to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to it anyway. The fact to which I refer is that the Supreme Court of the United States in what are known as "the Texas and Pacific Railway cases" has decided that by reason of the charter of that company alone by Congress it has the right to remove all its cases to the Federal courts for trial.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is quite correct. I had referred to them generally as the removal cases. I had not given the name of the cases.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Texas and Pacific Railway cases.

Mr. BACON. Yes; I know the cases. In two volumes, 111 and 115, if I correctly remember the numbers of the volumes, what are known as the removal cases are found. I had stated the proposition; but I am obliged to the Senator for again calling attention to it.

Now, Mr. President, I am, of course, occupying very much more time than I had any anticipation of doing. I have called attention to the fact that in the granting of a Federal charter for any carrier engaged in interstate commerce in a State, the right to tax the franchise by the State is taken away, and next that the right to the enjoyment of the trial of cases in State courts is practically denied where a party claims his right to trial in the Federal courts, even where concurrent jurisdiction is conferred by the law upon the State courts.

Another most grievous evil, to my mind, is the entering by the Federal Government in a wholesale way upon the exercise in States of the right of eminent domain. If the time shall some when the Federal Government, acting upon what we recognize as the doctrine laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States, proceeds to charter all those enterprises engaged in interstate commerce, then we have not here and there in isolated instances the exercise of the power of eminent domain by the Federal Government, but in a widespread system, reaching every nook and corner of a State where railroads penetrate, we have the Federal Government entering upon the exercise of this great fundamental and highest of all prerogatives, which takes a citizen's property without his consent.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me a minute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia, in connection with what he has just stated, that he is in error. Under sections 11 and 12 of this bill the right of eminent domain by this canal company is to be exercised under the laws of the respective States, so far as it concerns the State of Ohio, under the laws of that State, and so far as it relates to the State of Pennsylvania, under the laws of that State. So we do not withhold the exercise of the right of eminent domain from the States in any measure whatsoever.

Mr. BACON. I am very much obliged to the learned Senator. I am not discussing this particular charter in this particular connection, but even if I were, it would none the less be the exercise of eminent domain by the governmental power and authority of the United States. Even though you adopt the machinery prescribed by the State, it is none the less the going into the State by the Federal Government and reaching every remote corner of it in the exercise of the right of eminent domain. I am not speaking as to this particular case alone or limiting it to this case, but what will be the result if we enter upon this general policy of going into a State and reaching every corner of it in the exercise of the right of eminent domain by the United States Government.

Now, in this particular case, Mr. President, coming to that, it is true, I repeat, as stated by the Senator, reading from the particular section of this proposed charter, that it is prescribed that the exercise of this right shall be according to the law of each of these States. But it is none the less the exercise of the power by the Federal Government.

I am sorry that many Senators who are to vote upon this question, and some of whom are directly interested in this matter, are not here to hear it discussed. I want to call attention to the wide, far-reaching provisions of this bill under which the right of eminent domain by the authority of the United States is to be exercised, not simply in the two States that the Senator speaks of, but also in the State of New York, because a part of the territory covered by this charter in subjecting water courses, etc., is in the State of New York, although it is not named.

I wish to read some of the powers here. I read from page 8, section 11:

SEC. 11. That the said company, in the exercise of its right of eminent domain as granted in section 2 of this act, may, at its own expense and subject to and in conformity with the laws of the States, respectively, through which said canals may be constructed, enter upon and take such lands as are necessary and proper for the making, maintaining, and operating of the canals, feeders, and other works of the company hereby authorized, and it shall have the authority, at its own expense and subject to and in conformity with the laws of the States, respectively, through which said canals may be constructed, to alter any and all highways, waterways, railroads, and other works, either public or private, necessary for the making, maintaining, and operating of the canals, feeders, and other works of the company.

Now, Mr. President, while that is to be done in accordance with the machinery of the States, the power and authority are the power and authority of the United States.

But there is another feature of the exercise of eminent domain in this bill which is a very much more serious one than that, and that feature is found in the twelfth section, which authorizes this corporation to control all the waters of certain streams, with certain exceptions mentioned, and which I will read, of every kind in three States—Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York—which, while I can not, of course, state with accuracy, I judge by such an examination as I am able to give it upon the map will certainly cover an area of between 10,000 and 20,000 square miles.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. KNOX. I know the Senator wants to be accurate, and therefore I call his attention to the fact that it does not permit the control of all the waters of the Allegheny River above Franklin, but only the flood waters.

Mr. BACON. I am coming to that.

Mr. KNOX. The Senator stated that section 12 provided for the whole control of the waters. I only want to call attention to the fact——

Mr. BACON. I said with certain exceptions, which I would name the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. That is not an exception.

Mr. BACON. Well, limitations, then. I was careful to guard my language, but was possibly not accurate in its use. When I said "exceptions" I had that particular thing in my mind, and I think that possibly the language might be sufficient for the general purpose. When I used the word "exceptions" I meant that it was not unlimited, and that I would call attention to its particular features. Now I am going to read that section, Mr. President.

SEC. 12. That the said company in the exercise of its right of eminent domain as granted in section 2 of this act may, subject to the rights of the States, respectively, through which said canals shall pass, or any of the municipalities thereof affected thereby, to regulate and control the same, obtain, take, and use for the construction and operation of the said canals, feeders, and other works from the rivers, lakes, brooks, streams, water courses, ponds, reservoirs, and other sources of water supply sufficient water for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, operating, and using the said canals, feeders, and other works hereby authorized.

That certainly is without limitation.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I ask the Senator to read the proviso of it.

Mr. BACON. I am certainly going to read it all. The Senator need not doubt that. I simply pause at that point, Mr. President, for the purpose of saying that where the semicolon occurs in line 19, up to that point there is no limitation or exception.

From the rivers, lakes, brooks, streams, water courses, ponds, reservoirs, and other sources of water supply sufficient water for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, operating, and using the said canals, feeders, and other works hereby authorized.

There is no exception, no limitation; and I repeat, Mr. President, that, so far as I can judge by simply inspecting the map, there is an area of territory between ten and twenty thousand square miles upon which there is this absolutely unlimited power to take and use, and, as will be seen in the succeeding portion of the section, which I shall read, there carries with it the power to divert and to impound; and there is not a spring or a brook or a rivulet or a stream or a reservoir or a pond in all that vast area but what, with the great power of the United States behind it, this corporation can go into it and take for its own use, of course paying for it. But who can pay for the damage done to a neighborhood in drying up a stream, in the impounding of its waters, and the consequent drying up of the bed below? Who can pay, what money can pay, in a vast territory such as this, for the absolute sequestration and condemnation of all the water of every kind and from every source upon which the health and the comfort and the pleasure of a great people are so dependent? And yet there is no limitation to it.

Mr. President, it is bad enough for the State to grant such a power, but it is infinitely worse for the Federal Government to do it. When a State grants such power, if the people are troubled by it, there is very little difficulty in their going to the legislature and having it corrected; but who can estimate the difficulty which would attend the people who have this great, to say the least of it, inconvenience and trouble brought upon them, when they come to Congress to contend with the influences of a corporation with power to organize with a capital of $200,000,000, as is given in this charter? Who can estimate their difficulty when they are to come here and ask that Congress shall restore to them their springs, their brooks, their rivulets, their streams, their ponds, their reservoirs? Let Congress do that if it will, but it shall go down in the record of this day's proceedings that there was at least one man in the Senate of the United States to protest against it. Then it goes on——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to call the Senator's attention—I do not think he states the question fairly——

Mr. BACON. I have read the quotation accurately.

Mr. NELSON. All this must be done, the Senator will find if he will read the first part of section 12, "subject to the rights of the States, respectively, through which said canals shall pass, or any of the municipalities thereof affected thereby, to regulate and control the same."

Mr. BACON. Well, I have read that.

Mr. NELSON. All that of which the Senator from Georgia complains must be done subject to the laws of the States; and he has entirely overlooked the proviso at the end of the section.

Mr. BACON. I have not got to that yet. I have said to the Senator that I was going to read it. I have already read the particular words which he now quotes.

But, Mr. President, what does it mean when Congress passes a law giving certain rights and powers under that law when you say it shall be subject to the regulation and control of the States? Does it mean that the State can pass a law and negative this law? Would any man contend for a moment that any law of a State could nullify any single provision of this charter? Absolutely not. It would simply be a question, Mr. President, whether or not, when the Federal court comes to decide it, that this law, with all these powers, is being exercised in accordance with the rights of the States. Can it be said that where Congress empowers a company to take a stream and to impound it, or to take all the water from all the streams or all the reservoirs in a State and impound them, that any State should pass a law and say they should not do it; that the power granted by Congress would be negatived? No man will contend that for a moment. We give the express power to do these particular things, and we give them without reservation. The power given to the State "to regulate and control" does not carry with it the slightest power to negative and destroy the powers given to take, divert, impound, and use these waters. It only gives the power to the State to regulate and control the manner of taking, but in no particular to prohibit or in the slightest degree to limit the taking.

Mr. President, to continue with the reading where I left off, without the omission of any words, I am going to read it clear through, including the proviso, which the Senator from Minnesota has twice called to my attention. In the enumeration of powers it goes on to say:

Control and regulate the flood waters of the Allegheny River above Franklin, Pa., and the Beaver, Mahoning, Grand, Ashtabula, Shenango, and Little Shenango rivers, and Sandy Creek, and the tributaries of said streams, by regulating dams, weirs, reservoirs, and impounding dams—

That is sufficient up to that point. That simply means, of course, Mr. President, that as to these great rivers the flood waters are to be impounded in the same way that the waters are to be impounded under the irrigation scheme, and as to that there is no particular objection; but that has no particular relation to it. That is divided by a semicolon, and it has no relation whatever to the power previously given, which authorizes this corporation to utilize, divert, impound, and take to themselves all the waters referred to in the first part of this section after the semicolon in the nineteenth line. That power, up to the word "dams" in the twenty-third line, refers to dealing with flood waters; but the words which I now read do not refer to flood waters. The section continues:

and divert, alter, or impound the waters of any river, lake, brook, stream, and the tributaries of said streams or water courses when the same is necessary to the making, maintaining, and operating of the said canals, feeders, and other works hereby authorized.

Mr. President, there could not be a broader grant to this great corporation to go into this wide extent of territory and absolutely sequester and take to itself all the waters outside of the particular rivers to which the Senator from Pennsylvania has called my attention, all waters of every kind whatsoever, and divert them and impound them and use them. There could not be a broader grant than is given in this section.

I am now going to read, as desired by the Senator from Minnesota, the proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize said company to impair the navigability of any river or stream, or to diminish at any time the water supply of any city, village, or municipality below the normal minimum discharge cross-section area of any such river or stream, or in any manner to pollute the same.

Now, stop there. There is a protection of the water supply necessary for the navigation of a river, but that does not protect in the waters I am talking about. I am talking about the water to supply this vast population in parts of three States in between ten and twenty thousand square miles of territory. That relates simply to navigable rivers. It also relates to denying to them the right to "diminish at any time the water supply of any city, village, or municipality." That is the sole restriction. So far as the farmer is concerned and so far as the general mass of the people throughout this vast territory are concerned, who are dependent upon their springs and their streams and their rivulets and their brooks and their creeks for health and even life, there is absolutely no restriction. If the Senate is ready to pass a bill with such a provision in it, I repeat it shall not be said that it was passed without objection.

There is another proviso to the same section which reads:

Provided, That no feeders to supply water shall be connected with or draw water from the Niagara River above the Niagara Falls.

That is the entire section, and I repeat that it is an impossibility for any legitimate construction of that section to get away from the proposition that, outside of these large rivers, where the use of water is limited to the flood waters, outside of the use of water which would impair the navigability of a stream, and outside of the use of the water necessary for the purposes of any city, village, or municipality, there is absolutely no limit upon the right of this corporation to entirely take and use all the water which may be found in that country.

Mr. President, if anyone will look at that map, which was put here for the purpose of illustrating the necessity for this great work, he will see that from the character of the streams there, unless the water is to be gotten out of Lake Erie, all the water that is found in these little streams will be necessary to supply this great canal with a depth of 15 feet of water and a width of 167 feet at the bottom. The dimensions are stated in this pamphlet. It is to be a tremendous canal, and amounts really to a great river.

Mr. PENROSE. It will be 12 feet deep, I will say to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. Little or no water will come out of Lake Erie.

Mr. BACON. I am coming to that point a little later on. I am speaking now of the question as to whether or not, when the right is given to take all the water of every spring, rivulet, brook, and stream of every kind, it is an idle grant, or whether it is a grant which, if this canal is to be built and operated, must necessitate the use of these waters to the absolute destruction of the use of them by the people.

One other point, Mr. President. We have passed through the Senate "a bill for the control and regulation of the waters of Niagara River, for the preservation of Niagara Falls, and for other purposes." It has also passed the House of Representatives, and is now in conference, as I understand, upon some amendment. That bill is most carefully drawn and is most stringent in its provisions. The necessity for it grows out of the fact that on both sides of the Niagara River the utilization of the water, which would otherwise go over the falls, is so great for manufacturing purposes and objects of a kindred nature that the destruction of that great attractive feature of our country is imminent. Therefore, we have passed that bill, in which we have most carefully stipulated by accurate terms the limit of the amount of water which would otherwise flow over the falls at Niagara. That limitation, Mr. President, is not confined to the Niagara River itself, but it is extended to the Great Lakes, which supply the water which flows over the falls at Niagara.

We have put certain matters within the control and discretion of the Secretary of War, such as that there shall not be anything taken in the way of water for this purpose out of the Niagara River or tributary lakes except by his consent. But not content with prohibiting the use of any water without the consent of the Secretary of War, we limit his discretion in this bill which the Senate has passed.

After stating that with the approval of the Secretary of War so many horsepower, etc., may be used of the water of Niagara River, we put in this proviso:

Provided always—

This is on page 3, if the Senator has the bill before him—

Provided always, That the provisions herein permitting diversions and fixing the aggregate horsepower herein permitted to be transmitted into the United States, as aforesaid, are intended as a limitation on the authority of the Secretary of War.

In other words, we give him the discretion within certain limits, and beyond those limits there is no discretion to be vested in him. He can not authorize the use of any water beyond the limitation.

The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] before he left here two days ago gave notice of an amendment which he stated the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], in his absence, would move for him, and which uses this language:

Provided, That no water shall be drawn from above Niagara Falls unless approved and allowed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. President, that amendment is not sufficient if we are to adhere to the policy which we affirmed when we passed the bill from which I have just read. It is not sufficient to say that the Secretary of War shall approve the use of any of this water. If we are to adhere to the policy which we have adopted, it is necessary to go further and say that no water shall be taken from Lake Erie for this purpose which, in the aggregate, with other waters taken, shall exceed the amount specified in that bill. That bill has not yet become a law, and therefore it is impracticable for me to allude to it or to cite it as a law which imposes a limitation; but I shall ask the Senate to adopt this amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. In the first place, after the word "Falls," in the second line of his amendment, I would ask that there be inserted the words "either from Niagara River or its tributaries;" so that the amendment as amended would read:

Provided, That no water shall be withdrawn from above Niagara Falls, either from Niagara River or its tributaries, unless approved and allowed by the Secretary of War.

That language, "Niagara River or its tributaries," is found substantially in the bill which we have passed. Then I shall ask that there be added to the amendment these words:

And provided, That no greater amount of water shall be diverted from Niagara River or its tributaries above Niagara Falls than shall be specified in any general law of the United States limiting the same.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that it is perfectly practical, if I understand the matter aright, to use an amount of water in the operation of this canal which would utterly destroy the Niagara Falls. It is true that what is known as the "divide" on the immediate line of the canal is some distance from Lake Erie, and if that could only be surmounted by a series of locks of course the water which flows from the lake into that part of the canal would be arrested when it reached this high ground, and there could be no great flow of water from the lake on that account; but the important fact is this—and I ask the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to this fact, because he has been especially charged by the Senator from Massachusetts with the care of his amendment—that, according to the map which has been brought here for our information, that divide is some distance from Lake Erie on the immediate line of this canal; but when we go northeast, into the State of New York, it will be found that the divide runs practically up to the lake—certainly it is within a very short distance of the lake shore—and that it is perfectly practicable by what is known as a "feeder" to construct a canal northeast of the mouth of this proposed canal, which, leading from Lake Erie, shall go on the east side of this divide and conduct water to this canal upon the southern side of the divide and furnish it with an unlimited water supply from Lake Erie.

Mr. President, Senators may differ as to whether or not the Falls of Niagara are to be preserved; but the Senate at least has given its approval to the proposition that, so far as legislation can effect it, they are to be preserved. It does seem to me, therefore, that it would be the veriest contradiction of our former action for us to give a charter to a company which would have the power, under the conditions which I have named, to take from the Niagara Falls by drawing away from Lake Erie an amount of water which would practically destroy those falls.

As an illustration, Mr. President, of the importance of limiting this by law, and not leaving it to the discretion of the Secretary of War or any other one man, I will state that in a discussion of this question with a prominent Senator, who is not only fit to be Secretary of War but eminently fit to be President of the United States, if he should be chosen for that position, he said to me that he regarded the construction of the canal as of very much more importance than the preservation of Niagara Falls. So that if he should happen hereafter to be Secretary of War and should take that view of it he might give a consent which would result in the practical destruction of this great scenic feature of our country.

There is another fact to which I want to call attention. Anyone who will examine the map will see that the tributary rivers, the tributary streams, brooks, etc., the taking of the waters of which is authorized by this charter on this southern divide, run within a very few miles of the shores of Lake Erie in New York, and it is perfectly practicable, cutting to the east of that divide to the shores of Lake Erie, to connect the waters of those streams with the waters of Lake Erie, and in that way bring them down to the waters of the Monongahela.

The waters to be affected are not limited to the State of Pennsylvania or of Ohio. The tributary waters of the Allegheny River are in the State of New York. The famous Chautauqua Lake feeds one of the streams that is a tributary of the Allegheny River. Its western shore is within a very few miles of the eastern shore of Lake Erie, and, so far as I can judge from information had and from an examination of the maps, it would be a matter of the easiest practical accomplishment to cut what is known as a "feeder" from Lake Erie to Lake Chautauqua, and then cut from the southern shore of Lake Chautauqua a channel which would make a feeder down to the Allegheny River.

Mr. President, Lake Chautauqua is included in the authority given in this act. Lake Chautauqua is one of the lakes the waters of which this canal company is authorized to use without limit for the purpose of supplying this canal, and it is perfectly practicable, by cutting what is known as a "feeder" at Lake Chautauqua to conduct its waters out to this proposed canal, to lower the surface of that lake 6 or 8 or any other number of feet, according to the depth of the feeder. Yet New York is not to be consulted in the matter, and no citizen of the State of New York can possibly be heard relative thereto.

Mr. President, I shall not consume further the time of the Senate. I had not, in the discussion of this matter, had in view the expectation of defeating this charter; but, for several reasons, I think it is a most unfortunate thing that it should be granted. First, it is absolutely unnecessary, because the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio have already granted authority for the building of this canal, and have had reciprocal legislation which authorizes the two companies formed in the two States to meet at the State line and make a consolidated company for the construction and operation of this canal. In the second place, I am opposed to it because it opens a precedent, the extent of which, if followed, is absolutely startling in its immensity. If this charter is granted, it will be upon the ground that, under the Constitution of the United States, a company which is to be engaged in interstate commerce is a company which can be properly chartered by the Congress of the United States. If that principle is to be adopted and carried out to its fullest extent, it will relate to every railroad of any consequence in the whole United States, and will absolutely turn over to the Federal Government and to the administration of the Federal courts everything which relates to the management and control and business of practically all the railroads in the United States. What a revolution that will be in the internal affairs of each State is beyond the power of practical realization in its mere anticipation.

I am particularly opposed to it, Mr. President, because if we are to follow this precedent the States would absolutely lose the control of matters of this kind in so far as they relate to interstate commerce; they would lose control as to every corporation, great or small, on the land or on the water, engaged in interstate commerce. Can it be said that we are not going to do it? Are we to do it when any one of them asks for it? Are we to grant a charter whenever a corporation comes up and demands it, or are we to say, "We will be respecters of persons, and we will grant it in some cases and refuse it in others?" What can we do consistently, Mr. President, but to say that, recognizing the vast consequences which are to flow from this, we will grant these charters in no case except where there is involved a great governmental function, the performance of which can only be properly accomplished through a charter granted by the Federal Government, and the performance of which can not be accomplished through a charter granted by a State government.

Mr. President, there are a number of other details in this bill to which I should like to call attention, but I shall very briefly allude to but one matter. This bill proposes that these incorporators be permitted to issue stock not exceeding $400,000 per mile, and that they be authorized to issue bonds not exceeding $400,000 per mile, or a total of $800,000 per mile. I have in this pamphlet, from which I have already read, the estimate by those who have made an examination of the matter, as to the cost of the construction of this canal. Referring to page 24, after speaking of the fact that the legislature in 1899 had appointed a commission to inquire into the practicability of this waterway and appropriated $10,000 for that purpose, it says—this is from the speech of Mr. Shaw, on the occasion of this great meeting in Pittsburg:

> They reported a canal could be built via the Beaver and Shenango rivers to Conneaut Harbor at a cost of about $30,000,000.

I presume that that is the most practicable route, or they would not have selected it for that purpose.

Mr. President, in this same speech it is stated that the length of that canal would be 122 miles. If any Senator will figure on it, he will ascertain that it is about $270,000 a mile; and here is a corporation, with a report which they themselves bring here and lay before us, which says the canal can be constructed at $270,000 a mile, asking us that they may put upon it obligations to the extent of $800,000 a mile.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. KNOX. I wish to direct the attention of the Senator from Georgia, as well as the attention of the Senate, to the report of the Senate committee on that subject. The report of the Senate committee shows that the unit cost of construction upon every item which will enter into the construction of the canal has advanced in some cases as high as 60 per cent; and in a letter written to the chairman of the subcommittee, who reported the bill, it is shown that the cost of the physical structures alone on the present prices will amount to over $500,000 a mile, and that makes no allowance whatever for damages to be paid to property owners through whose land it passes or whose streams it may divert or other expenses incident to the construction of the canal.

Besides, the matter of capitalization is absolutely guarded by the Senate amendment, which prevents these people from issuing a dollar of capital over and above that which is actually required to construct the canal.

Mr. BACON. I will say to the learned Senator from Pennsylvania that if the bill is properly guarded in that particular, of course the criticism which I make in that regard is an improper one, and I would not insist upon it. I understand that the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has an amendment upon that subject. I have not had any opportunity to examine it. The Senator will very readily recognize the fact that reading from a report which he himself had laid before me, I was certainly excused if I was misled into supposing, when that report stated that the cost of the canal would be $30,000,000, that that statement was correct. If it is not correct, I do not wish to make any adverse criticism upon it.

Mr. KNOX. That is a very natural mistake to make; but if the Senator had observed, the pamphlet to which he refers was issued in December, 1904.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. KNOX. And this letter written to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who reported the bill, was written March 20, 1906.

Mr. BACON. That is true. But the pamphlet was laid upon my desk by the Senator or his colleague, or by their authority, and when I receive a statement direct from those most interested, I certainly am excused if I do not go further to see whether or not it is correct. I was relying upon information which the Senator himself had put in my hands, and for that reason it was not necessary to go any further to look. If the Senator says the information he gave to me is incorrect, I accept the statement, and the Senate will understand that I do not make any criticism upon it, although I confess I am unable to understand how the estimated cost of this proposed canal has been raised from $270,000 per mile to $800,000 per mile.

Mr. KNOX. I do not state that the information was incorrect. The information was absolutely correct at the time it was given.

Mr. BACON. I know; but I mean now.

Mr. KNOX. The reason for the additional cost is fully explained in the report. I should think that the Senator who has occupied so much of the time of the Senate in debating this bill would at least have read the committee's report.

Mr. BACON. The Senator says it was correct at the time. I supposed when I received it from the Senator that he meant me to understand it was correct now. I do not mean that the Senator intended to mislead me. I know he did not. I am simply suggesting to the Senator that when he puts before me a document in which a statement is made, I do not deem it necessary to go further to see whether those conditions have changed; and there was no intimation to me that they had changed; and I repeat I do not see how the changes in conditions in two years can cause so great a change in cost.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let me call the Senator's attention to a matter in connection with the statement he has just made. The Senator from Georgia has very properly pointed out that under section 3, stock to the amount of $400,000 a mile, and bonds in addition, to the extent of $400,000 a mile, may be issued against this property. I call his attention to another fact, which to my mind is significant, and that is that the debt referred to is limited to bonded indebtedness, and the words "and other," referring to indebtedness, have been stricken out.

So, in addition to stock at the rate of $400,000 a mile and a bonded indebtedness of $400,000 a mile, there may be other indebtedness issued against this property. For some reason which I do not understand, but which appears to me significant, the words "and other" were stricken out, so that there is no limitation whatever in the bill upon the amount of indebtedness which may be issued against the property of this corporation per mile, except with respect to the bonded indebtedness. Of course there may be other indebtedness against the property than that evidenced by bonds.

Mr. BACON. I am very much obliged to the Senator. The fact to which he has alluded had escaped me.

I desire to call attention to one other matter, and that is section 5. This assumes to be a great work in the interest of the public, and the bill undertakes to make provision by which the public is to be protected from improper charges. The words are used in the bill which were taken from the rate bill—that the charges shall be "just and reasonable and fairly remunerative." I presume the Senator who favored the striking out of the words "fairly remunerative" from the rate bill will also favor striking out those words from this bill so as to leave it "just and reasonable."

Mr. CULBERSON. In what section is that?

Mr. BACON. I have forgotten where that is particularly. Those words are in there—"just and reasonable and fairly remunerative." But the point I am calling attention to in the fifth section is this: In this provision the proposition is certainly intended to be laid down and the understanding had that there should be only a fair remuneration to those who go into this enterprise for the work which they perform and the investment which they make. In addition to that, though, section 5 provides this:

> SEC. 5. That the said company may from time to time set aside a portion of its net earnings to be a sinking fund for the redemption of its said bonds or securities, with or without unearned interest, at such times, in such proportion, and in such manner, by allotment or otherwise, as may be determined by the board of directors.

Then immediately thereafter in the next section it prescribes that whenever there has been as much as $5,000 for every mile subscribed and paid in there may be an organization, and there is no provision in the bill—I may be mistaken, and if I am I shall be glad to be corrected—which requires the payment of any additional money. Taking the two together, with this vast amount of bonded indebtedness authorized and the unlimited indebtedness further authorized, to which the Senator from Texas has called my attention, it is manifest to my mind—I may be mistaken about it; I may draw an improper conclusion—that the scheme is to pay in $5,000 a mile, and to contract a great debt, and then to make the public out of what it shall pay for the use of the canal pay ultimately for the canal. This can be done, as there is no limit on the contraction of debt other than the bonded debt.

I think if this is to be a great enterprise, in the interest of the public, that those who go into it should pay for it out of their own pockets, and not out of the earnings from the people, unless they use their own dividends when earned for the purpose of paying it off. They should not themselves enjoy dividends and at the same time have the right to make such charges as will enable them in addition to lay aside money which will ultimately pay the cost of the construction of the canal.

Mr. President, I want to say just one word in a matter I omitted in speaking of the constitutional question. I have no doubt in the world, as I have repeatedly said, as to the ruling of the Supreme Court in the future, as it has made in the past, that Congress has the right to charter a corporation to engage in interstate commerce. I have as little doubt about that as I have about the proposition that that was not the original contemplation of the framers of the Constitution. It is true it matters not what was in fact their intention, as we are to be controlled and guided by the present interpretation of the instrument by the courts of the land. But my attention has been called to the action of the convention which framed the Constitution, which illustrates the fact that such was not the purpose of the framers of the Constitution.

It so happened that a similar question to this was before the Senate in the year 1869. That was a proposition to charter a railroad from the city of New York to the city of Washington, basing it upon the identical grounds that being engaged in interstate commerce it was a legitimate matter of legislation in the granting of a charter. That was debated in this body, and there participated in that debate the present junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE], who has returned to us after his service of several different times in this body. In the speech which he made on that occasion against the granting of that charter, which, by the way, the Senate in that day considered to be an improper thing and refused to do, he read from the proceedings of the Constitutional Convention. I have his speech before me in the Congressional Globe. It was a date prior to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—January 20, 1869. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] read this extract from the Madison Papers. The committee of the Convention had under consideration the clause in the Constitution which authorizes Congress to construct post-roads, when this occurred in the Convention:

> Doct r Franklin moved to add after the words "post-roads," article 1, section 8, a power "to provide for cutting canals where deemed necessary."
> Mr. Wilson seconded the motion.
> Mr. Sherman objected. The expense in such cases will fall on the United States and the benefit accrue to the places where the canals may be cut.
> Mr. WILSON. Instead of being an expense to the United States, they may be made a source of revenue.
> Mr. Madison suggested an enlargement of the motion—

To this particular point I call attention—

> Mr. Madison suggested an enlargement of the motion into a power "to grant charters of incorporation where the interests of the United States might require and the legislative provisions of individual States may be incompetent." His primary object was, however, to secure an easy communication between the States, which the free intercourse now to be opened seemed to call for. The political obstacles being removed, a removal of the natural ones as far as possible ought to follow.
> Mr. Randolph seconded the proposition.
> Mr. King thought the power unnecessary.
> Mr. WILSON. It is necessary to prevent a State from obstructing the general welfare.
> Mr. KING. The States will be prejudiced and divided into parties by it. In Philadelphia and New York it will be referred to as the establishment of a bank, which has been a subject of contention in those cities. In other places it will be referred to mercantile monopolies.
> Mr. Wilson mentioned the importance or facilitating by canals the communication with the western settlements.
> The motion being so modified as to admit a distinct question, specified and limited to the case of canals, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Georgia voted for the proposition; New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, North Carolina, and South Carolina voted "no."
> The other part fell, of course, including the power rejected.

So we have here, Mr. President, not a side light, but a direct light cast on what was the purpose and understanding of the framers of the Constitution. Railroads in those days were unknown. If they had been known, I have no doubt the proposition of Mr. Madison would have included railroads as well as canals.

Mr. President, I presume the Senate will give me credit for sincerity when I say that I had no expectation when I arose this afternoon of thus occupying the time of the Senate. I repeat, I regard it as a very grave question. We are to-day face to face with the proposition whether we shall in the exercise of this power grant these extraordinary corporate rights and powers to this particular corporation on the ground that it is to be engaged in interstate commerce, and at the same time have the mental resolve that we will not do so in the future, and that we will deny similar applications in the future, or else that we occupy the alternative attitude that we put behind us now and forever the proposition that we are to leave to the States the exercise of the functions of granting corporate charters in cases not necessary and essential to the performance of any governmental function, and that hereafter whenever a corporation comes here and says that it is to be engaged in interstate commerce we will give it a Federal charter, give it the power to deny to the States the right to tax its franchise, and the right of the citizens to go into their own courts to settle disputes which they will have with these corporations.

We must do one of two things. We must either occupy the attitude of being respectors of persons, of granting these charters in certain cases where certain influences may demand them, and of denying them in other instances where they may not be so fortunate. We have either got to do that, if we grant this charter, or else we have to open the door and say hereafter the States shall no longer, if parties choose to elect in favor of a Federal charter, have control of these agencies of commerce in their own States; that the States shall no longer have the right to tax their franchises; that the States shall no longer have the right to adjudicate the rights of citizens in their own States in controversies between themselves and these myriad agencies. Mr. President, what a revolution would that be in present conditions.

Mr. President, there is another very serious consideration. We can not say to corporations when they come here, "We have granted it to others, and we deny it to you." If we do not say that, what is to be the political effect in this country of all the corporations engaged in interstate commerce having Federal charters, knit together by a common sympathy, and exercising power under a common authority? Who will doubt the fact that they will go at once into national politics? Who can doubt the fact, whenever the great corporations of this country, solidified and unified as they are rapidly becoming, are all of them in the exercise of power under Federal authority, that they will exercise great influence over the affairs of the Federal Government?

Mr. President, I repeat it is a most grave matter, and I repeat it simply for the purpose of excusing myself if I have occupied unduly the time of the Senate, and if I have expressed myself with unwonted earnestness it is because of the gravity of this matter in my opinion, and I may be excused and acquitted by Senators who have an interest in this matter of any intention to interfere in any manner with those matters which may seem more particularly to concern them, matters in which they have a very deep concern, and if any intemperate word has fallen from me in this discussion, it is due to my appreciation of the gravity of the question, and not because of any want of consideration of them.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BURKETT submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18442) to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the board of education of the District of Columbia, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 8, 13, 14, 16, 17, and 51.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 9, 10, 11, 12, 18, 19, 20, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 35, 37, 38, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 52, 53, and 54; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out in said amendment the words "in the grades;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Page 5, line 14, strike out the word "schools" and insert before the word "high" the word "normal;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the word proposed in said amendment insert the word "four;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "School," in the last line of said amendment, insert the words "but this limitation shall not apply to pupils who have already entered upon a continuous course of two or more years;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "board" in said amendment and insert the word "boards;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 34, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Page 8, line 9, after the words "normal schools," strike out the word "or" and insert the word "and;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 36, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted in said amendment insert the following: "of examiners. No person without a degree from an accredited college, or a graduation certificate from an accredited normal school, such normal school graduate to have had at least five years of experience as a teacher in a high school, shall hereafter be appointed to teach any academic or scientific subjects in the normal, high, and manual training schools;" also strike out the word "board" on page 8, line 12, and insert the word "boards;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 39, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out in said amendment the word "board," in line 1, and insert the word "boards;" also strike out the words "this board" and insert the words "these boards;" and the Senate agree to the same.

E. J. BURKETT,
N. B. SCOTT,
JOHN M. GEARIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

EDWARD MORRELL,
WILLIAM S. GREENE,
F. A. MCLAIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the report?

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator who has made this report, as it is up now for action, to briefly state what the amendments are. Of course one can not tell merely from hearing the report read as to what are the amendments made by the committee.

Mr. BURKETT. There are quite a number of amendments made by the conference committee. In the main they change words from the singular to the plural form, and relate to terminology. I think the chief amendment, the one that is most distinct, is the one that pertains to the qualifications of high school teachers. The Senator will remember that the Senate agreed to an amendment to the House bill, providing that a teacher of the high school must have a college degree. The conference committee agreed to that with an amendment accepting a certificate from a recognized normal school. That is the amendment to it. It is left as the Senate had it, but accepting as a qualification a certificate of a normal school.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator be good enough to state what disposition was made of the amendment which I offered in the Senate striking out the word "four" and inserting "five," so that teachers of drawing and others would get the pay of class 5 and class A of class 6?

Mr. BURKETT. Does the Senator remember what page it was on?

Mr. NELSON. At the top of page 7.

Mr. BURKETT. I will say to the Senator that at the top of page 7 and at the bottom of page 6 the Senate receded from all those amendments, and put it back in the condition it was in when it came from the House, leaving it four and five. It puts domestic science teachers in the same class with physical culture and drawing teachers.

Mr. NELSON. What about teachers of drawing in the high schools?

Mr. BURKETT. It leaves the bill in that respect just as it came from the House to the Senate originally. It drops out the Senate amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator what was the action of the conferees in reference to the amendment fixing the qualifications of the assistant superintendent?

Mr. BURKETT. That was stricken out by the conferees.

Mr. McCUMBER. So that at present no particular qualifications are required of the assistant superintendent?

Mr. BURKETT. No. It is left just as it came from the House. That was amendment numbered 51, I will say to the Senator, and the Senate receded. There is no qualification for the superintendent or the assistant superintendent, and for a good many more for whom some qualifications ought to be prescribed. But, as we tried to explain in the first place, we did not go into the matter of organization very thoroughly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is the Senator especially desirous of having the report adopted to-day? Is there any occasion to have it adopted before it can be printed, so that we can see just what the amendments are which have been agreed to and those from which the Senate receded?

Mr. BURKETT. So far as I am concerned, it is immaterial to me other than to comply with the request of other members of the Senate and House. The District of Columbia appropriation bill is necessarily being held up until we can get this bill through. As the Senator will remember, all the school salaries in the District appropriation bill and all the appropriations for the public schools were stricken out when the District appropriation bill was before the Senate. Of course, they can not bring in a bill without filling in something, and they are waiting until we can get this bill through, so as to tell what amount to put in. Of course, they are urging us all the way along, and the report ought to be considered here. We hoped to get it over to the House this evening, so that it could be printed and be taken up under their rules in the morning, and then sometime to-morrow the conferees on the District appropriation bill could consider the matter. It is the haste of others that is pushing the committee, which has made us want to have the report taken up and disposed of at once.

I will say to the Senator, as the report shows, that the House receded from its disagreement to practically all of the Senate amendments. There are only six from which the Senate receded, and most of them are verbal changes. There was only one important one, and that was on the matter of the qualification of the assistant superintendent, where the Senate receded.

Mr. McCUMBER. That was to me quite an important amendment—in fact, I thought it was the most important of all the amendments made in the Senate. I wish the Senator could let the report be printed this evening, and it will be business, of course, which will take precedence over all other business to-morrow. We could then see just exactly what changes have been made.

Mr. BURKETT. It will delay it one day in the House, and that is why they have urged us to get it considered to-night, so that it may go over there and be taken up to-morrow. It will simply delay the matter in connection with the District appropriation bill.

I understand the interest the Senator from North Dakota took in this subject, and I will say to the Senator that the Senate conferees were loyal for four or five days hanging on to the Senator's amendment. I do not know whether I ought to tell that or not. However, after a good deal of discussion and consideration in conference it was obvious that it would have to go out. I do not think any further conference could do other than kill the bill if that particular amendment was insisted upon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know, Mr. President, that I will insist upon the matter going over if the Senator is in a hurry. I feel that the time will come when we will need to make an amendment to this bill. I think it is such an improvement over the law as it has heretofore stood that perhaps we had better take what we can get, and so get a much better bill than we now have, with the hope that we may secure a still better one in the future.

Mr. BURKETT. I will say to the Senator that if the new board which is created does not handle some matters and some positions that are without any particular merit in the estimation of the committee, it will be very proper for Congress at the next session to do away with some of these supernumerary positions and reorganize the schools as they should be organized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

LAKE ERIE AND OHIO RIVER SHIP CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14396) to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, to define the powers thereof, and to facilitate interstate commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment as amended.

Mr. BACON. That is what amendment?

Mr. BACON. As I understand the amendment to the amendment it strikes out the last sentence of the words proposed to be inserted by the committee.

The SECRETARY. Striking out the words:

Said corporation is also vested with all such further and additional powers as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 2, page 3, line 4, after "railroad," to insert "and ship canal;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the company, in addition to the powers expressed or implied in this act, shall have the right of eminent domain, which shall be exercised as provided in the case of railroad and ship canal companies organized under the laws, respectively, of the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, on page 3, line 7, after the word "exceed," to strike out "three" and insert "four," so as to read:

That the capital stock of the company shall not exceed $400,000 per mile of canal proposed to be constructed, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. In line 9 the words "and other," before "indebtedness," are proposed to be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary has not yet stated that amendment.

Mr. NELSON. I suggest that we pass on the committee amendments first and then take up other amendments afterwards. We have not yet reached the amendment the Senator refers to.

Mr. CULBERSON. I wish to move an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. NELSON. We have not reached that yet.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is in section 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the next amendment, the Chair will state to the Senator.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I know that the Senators in charge of this bill and the Senate are anxious to dispose of this measure as speedily as possible, and it ought to be disposed of to-day.

It is not my intention to delay a vote on the bill by consuming much time. But, Mr. President, as I am a member of the Committee on Commerce, and as I was a member of the subcommittee to which this bill was referred, I feel as if I ought to say something with regard to it. I attended all the meetings of the subcommittee except one. I voted to report the bill favorably to the whole committee, and afterwards to report it to the Senate.

If I can judge by the course the discussion has taken, it looks as if few Senators on this side of the Chamber are in sympathy with the action I intend to take and the vote I intend to cast. I want, therefore, to occupy a little time to explain my position and to give a reason for my vote. I expect to vote for the passage of the bill. I think it ought to be passed. I can not see a good reason why it should not be passed. There seems to be no doubt about the constitutional right of the Congress to grant this charter.

I listened to the greater part of the interesting speech delivered by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] in opposition to the bill, and I have listened to the speeches of other Senators in criticism of the measure. No one who has opposed the bill has denied that the Congress is clothed by the Constitution with power to grant this charter. There can be no doubt that that power exists. Whether the Constitution should have invested the Congress with this power, or whether the courts should have so construed the Constitution as to invest the Congress with this power, are questions so devoid of practical consequence as to be of little value. A discussion of that subject is without significance. It might do for a debating society, but it is of little value here. Such questions are settled questions, and I believe they were properly and wisely settled.

Mr. President, I have been all my life associated and in sympathy with that school of politics which believes in a strict construction of the Constitution. But the Constitution is not a meaningless thing. It means what it says. Some of the wisest and greatest Democrats whose names and achievements adorn our history have stood for the exercise by Congress of just such powers as it is proposed shall be exercised at this time and through the agency of this measure.

It is utterly useless to discuss in an academic way questions which have long since passed into the domain of well-settled law. Granted, therefore, that Congress has, and unquestionably it does have, the power to create this corporation, we come next to inquire as to the policy of exercising that power.

Mr. President, as to the question of policy—that is, whether the Congress should pass this bill and create this corporation—Senators may very properly differ.

When this bill was first called to my attention in the committee, I seriously doubted whether it would be a wise policy for Congress to create a corporation of this character. Certainly Congress ought to be very slow in granting charters to business corporations. In ninety-nine cases in every hundred those seeking corporate franchises should be remitted to the States. But, Mr. President, whether Congress shall exercise the power of creating a corporation, where it has constitutional warrant to create it, is and should be a question to be determined by the facts and circumstances of each particular case. There may be circumstances and conditions in particular cases where the Congress ought to grant charters, and I think this is one of those rare cases.

This canal company is to utilize navigable waters under the jurisdiction of the United States. If we did not pass this bill and the company should be compelled to incorporate under the laws of a State, it would be necessary for the company to come to Congress for authority to use navigable waters in the way it would have to use them, and so Congressional authority would have to be invoked in any event. Then why not let Congress act in the first instance?

Mr. President, I believe that the Government of the United States itself ought to construct works of this character. When I came to consider this bill an objection arose in my mind because this work, national in character, was to be committed to the hands of a corporation. But while that was true, I saw no prospect of the Government undertaking the work for years to come, if, indeed, it should ever do so.

The United States are now engaged in the construction of a canal across the Isthmus that will occupy their attention and monopolize their energies and resources for many years to come, and through that indefinite period it is scarcely to be hoped that the Government will enter upon a like enterprise of the magnitude of this. So it seemed to me that if we were to wait for the Government to take it up we would wait for years without assurance that it would ever be done.

Mr. President, the commercial importance of this work can not be gainsaid. There is a real demand for the construction of this canal. A greater amount of freight is carried to and fro from Pittsburg to Lake Erie points than is carried in any other similar area in the world. At this time over 50,000,000 tons are transported between Pittsburg and the lake, and the tonnage is increasing from year to year. This canal would open a new highway for this commerce and greatly cheapen the cost of carriage. It would open a cheap waterway to the Great Lakes and to all the rich and prosperous country tributary to them. The value of the enormous commerce that this canal might accommodate is adequately and accurately stated in the report of the committee.

There is no constitutional objection to the bill. Neither can any wise, well-founded objection to it be stated based on grounds of public policy. On the other hand there are commanding reasons of great commercial consequence why the canal should be constructed. Then why should not this act be passed?

One other thing, Mr. President, which has operated to induce me to support this bill is the fact that for years I have dreamed—I think "dreamed" is the proper word—of a great transcontinental waterway from New Orleans, on the Gulf of Mexico, to tide water somewhere on the North Atlantic coast. I say I have dreamed of this, but I have no doubt it is a dream which some day will be realized.

Mr. President, I am not sure that the millions we are to expend in the construction of the Panama Canal would not be more profitably and wisely expended if we should devote them to the construction of a canal from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi River, and thence down that great stream to the Gulf, making the canal and the river navigable for such ships as ply the Lakes. That is a project which Congress will be called upon some day to deal with, and to deal with as a great national problem—a problem to be worked out not by corporations, but by the nation itself.

The Mississippi River has within its banks water in abundance to answer the needs of such a highway, if only these waters are put under control; and they can be controlled and utilized if some of the ablest engineers of the country are to be believed. It will be a stupendous work to make this waterway, and a costly one, too, but it will be well worth all it will cost in labor and treasure.

A canal connecting the Lakes with the Mississippi River, and with that river so improved as to make it navigable for large vessels, thus connecting the Gulf and the Lakes, and thence across the Lakes and through the Erie Canal to New York, would make a waterway the like of which the world has never seen. Its value would be beyond the power of man to compute; and, moreover, it would in large measure solve the most intricate and difficult problems of railroad transportation.

I believe this canal, built from Pittsburg to Lake Erie, would be in the course of time but an arm to a great system of canals that ought to be, and some day will be, constructed by the Government of the United States. The great States of the Mississippi Valley and the great agricultural and manufacturing States of the Middle West will some day demand that this greater work shall be done, and they will be strong enough to enforce the demand. Because this Ohio River and Lake Erie Canal will be a beginning and a part of the great canal system we ought to have, and are to have, is one reason why I am for this bill. If the Government would build the canal provided for in this bill, I should infinitely prefer it; but as it is, since the Government is not prepared to enter upon the work, I can see no legitimate objection to authorizing an association of enterprising American citizens to undertake it and complete it.

Mr. President, this bill has been criticised, as it should have been. Some amendments have been suggested to it and agreed to. The committee that had it in charge labored assiduously and faithfully to perfect it, so as to guard, as far as possible, the public interest; and I believe we have brought a good measure here. Senators have complained of this and of that, without having carefully examined the provisions of the bill itself. Their attention has been called in the course of the debate to provisions in the bill that proved the folly of many of their criticisms. For instance, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and perhaps others, thought it unwise and in some respects dangerous for Congress to create a corporation that could exercise the right of eminent domain. They cried out against conferring upon a national corporation the power to enter a State and condemn the property of citizens under the law of eminent domain. Whether that objection was well founded or not, in an academic or a theoretical sense, in its application to this bill it is absolutely without merit. Section 11 provides:

SEC. 11. That the said company, in the exercise of its right of eminent domain as granted in section 2 of this act, may, at its own expense and subject to and in conformity with the laws of the States, respectively, through which said canals may be constructed, enter upon, etc.

The Senate amended the bill as it came from the House so as to require the corporation in taking land, or in doing anything else under the law of eminent domain, to conform its action and procedure to the law of the States. So there is nothing to that.

In like manner you may go through the whole bill, Mr. President, and these objections, one after another, may be answered by pointing to the provisions of the bill itself. I see no reason why the Senate should stand in the way of the passage of a bill so carefully drawn as this one is, and which so well guards the public interest; a bill which is unquestionably authorized by the Constitution; a bill against which no good reason founded in public policy can be urged; a bill which meets a great public commercial need, and which, to a large extent, satisfies it; a bill that would promote the public welfare, not only of the States through which the canal would pass, but of a vast region of country in which many of the greatest industries of the nation are located—a region populous, opulent, with resources beyond computation, and with a future so glorious that no human foresight can circumscribe it. I can see no reason why a bill so constructed and serving such ends should not be enacted.

So I looked at it, Mr. President, when it was before the committee, and feeling then as I do now I voted to report it, as did every other member of the Committee on Commerce who was present, without regard to party division. I intend now, though I may stand alone on this side of the Chamber, to vote for it again.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss the pending bill and should have said nothing but for the last remark of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I am a member of the Committee on Commerce, but I was not present at any time when the bill was pending before the committee. I was absent in Arkansas. I did not know the bill had been pending before the committee until the delivery of the speech of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] a few days ago. Had I been present in the committee, I should have voted against a favorable report on the bill. I never have voted in favor of the General Government granting charters to corporations of this character, and shall not do so now.

I simply wanted to correct the statement that it was a unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. STONE. I said of those present.

Mr. BERRY. Yes; I was not present, and therefore did not vote. I was not included.

Mr. STONE. No; the Senator was not included.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask some Senator where this proposed canal will strike the Great Lakes, if anyone is sufficiently informed to tell me? I can not find out from reading the bill. I do not know where it is. The point is not designated.

Mr. KNOX. At or near Ashtabula.

Mr. TELLER. Does it say so in the bill?

Mr. KNOX. No; it does not. The northern terminus is not specifically located in the bill; but that is the plan.

Mr. TELLER. That it shall be near Ashtabula?

Mr. KNOX. Yes; and I will say to the Senator from Colorado that it will have to be located at such point as may be approved by the Secretary of War; and certainly his idea is to locate it at Ashtabula.

Mr. TELLER. I want to call the attention of the Senator to a provision here which strikes me as very remarkable, though I do not say that it seriously affects the bill. It is this proviso on page 10:

Provided, That no feeders to supply water shall be connected with or draw water from the Niagara River above the Niagara Falls.

Mr. KNOX. I believe the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] has an amendment to propose to that proviso, which will make a very material difference in the reading of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I want to say that no water could be gotten into this canal from the Niagara River unless it should run uphill. Niagara River is much below any point where, I think, this canal can be built to strike the Lakes. I do not suppose this proviso will endanger the bill, but it looks somewhat ridiculous, and as if we did not know much about the geography of that section of the country. That happens to be a section of country which in my early days I knew something about.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will examine the map, he will see that the headwaters of the Allegheny River rise at about Lake Chautauqua.

Mr. TELLER. I do not need to examine the map. That is a country with which I am familiar.

Mr. BACON. I withdraw the suggestion. I understand the fact to be, however, as I suggested.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I was simply replying to his suggestion as to the impossibility of water coming from that direction by referring to the fact that the headwaters do rise in that neighborhood and flow——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, they do not rise anywhere near the Niagara River.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon for undertaking to suggest anything on the subject.

Mr. TELLER. It is an impossibility to get any water into the Allegheny River from the Niagara River, and the upper waters of the Niagara River will be a great many feet higher than the others. But that is not a matter of any consequence to the bill, except that it rather mars the bill in the opinion of those of us who happen to know how ridiculous it is to put it in there.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I only want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the provision was inserted by the committee. Not having been upon the committee, I can not tell why it was inserted.

Mr. TELLER. I saw that the provision had been put in by the committee.

Mr. CLAY. I will say to the Senator that I think it was inserted at the instance of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to state for the information of the Senator from Colorado that he is entirely right. That provision is not necessary and it may be not properly in the bill, but it was put in, following the lines of an amendment introduced by the senior Senator from New York, to quiet the apprehensions of many good people who are fearful that further devastation will occur in connection with the Niagara River and Niagara Falls. I myself do not consider that the provision amounts to anything, either as a protection or that it has reference to the canal.

Mr. TELLER. That is correct, Mr. President. I heard from the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] that we had passed a bill to prevent the taking of water out of the Niagara River. I was not aware of that fact, and I thought I kept fairly well in touch with what is going on; but that escaped my attention. I myself deny the right of Congress to interfere with the Niagara River. That right belongs to the State of New York.

Mr. SPOONER. It is an international stream.

Mr. TELLER. And anything may be done to that river that does not impair its navigation. When anything interferes with navigation, the nation may undoubtedly have something to say, but except at its upper end it is scarcely a navigable river on account of its rapids, etc.

I know there is a very sensitive feeling and very great excitement throughout the country about the destruction of Niagara Falls. That is a stupendous falls, it is true; but I myself can not sympathize with the sentiment that complains of the useful appropriation of water for power, for irrigation, or for any other purpose that is legitimate and proper. I suppose not one person out of ten thousand in the United States ever sees the falls. If the water power of those falls can be utilized for the benefit of commerce and the benefit of humanity, it ought to be done. If there is anywhere a right to interfere for the protection of the falls, the Niagara River at that point not being navigable and the Government not having anything to do with it, that right belongs, in the first instance, in my judgment, to the State of New York, though of course it is a dividing line between the United States and Canada.

I suppose the same question arises with reference to the people of Canada. The Canadians are taking the water out on their side, as it is being taken out on ours, and the Canadians will continue to take that water, whatever we may do. When the bill for the protection of Niagara Falls becomes a law, the situation will be that while the Canadians are taking the water out on their side, we will have passed a law providing that the people of the State of New York shall not take the water on their side. That is one of the things that we ought to let alone.

The proposed Lake Erie Canal will not interfere with the Niagara River in the slightest degree, and I do not think it can take any water from the lake that will do the lake any harm. The water that goes to the useful purpose of this canal must be taken from those rivers which the canal will cross, and, so far as that is concerned, I do not think there is any complaint that can be made about this bill.

My objection to it is not on any of those grounds. I object to it because I do not think the Government of the United States ought to charter such companies when there is ample power in the States to do the same thing, and they can do it just as well as we can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 3, page 3, line 9, after the word "bonded," to strike out "and other;" in line 10, after the word "exceed," to strike out "three" and insert "four;" in line 11, after the word "mile," to insert "of canal;" in line 12, before the word "debt," to insert "bonded;" in line 13, before the word hundred," to strike out "six" and insert "eight;" in line 14, after the word "constructed," to strike out "and" and insert "Provided, however, That;" in line 15, after the word "and," to strike out "fully paid in in cash and bona fide expended in the promotion, maintenance, and construction of said canals and works; and" and to insert "paid in in money, or property at its fair value: Provided further, That;" in line 20, after the word "be," to strike out "in larger amount" and insert "more;" in line 25, after the word "bonds," to insert "secured by a mortgage or deed of trust upon its property and franchises;" and on page 4, line 2, after the word "company," to strike out "secured by a mortgage upon its property and rights of property of all kinds and descriptions, real, persopal, and mixed, including its franchise to be a corporation;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the capital stock of the company shall not exceed $400,000 per mile of canal proposed to be constructed, divided into shares of $100 each, and the bonded indebtedness authorized by this act shall not exceed $400,000 per mile of canal proposed to be constructed, so that the sum total of stock issued and bonded debt created shall not exceed $800,000 per mile of canal proposed to be constructed: Provided, however, That the amount of debt created by the issue of bonds shall in no case exceed the amount of stock subscribed for and paid in in money, or property at its fair value: Provided further, That in no event shall the stock issued and debt created be more than may be necessary to construct, equip, maintain, and operate said canals and works pursuant to and in compliance with all the provisions of this act; and said company is hereby authorized to issue its bonds, secured by a mortgage or deed of trust upon its property and franchises, and the same shall be a first and prior lien to all other claims or demands upon the company.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Before passing from that amendment I wish to make an inquiry about the words "and other," in line 9, on page 3. I understood when the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] brought up the consideration of those words earlier in the discussion a short time ago, it was agreed that the committee amendment should be rejected and that the words "and other" should remain in the bill. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], who has charge of the bill, informs me that he is entirely willing that those words should remain in the bill. I see the Senator from Texas is absent from the floor now, and I ask——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator offer an amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask that the vote be reconsidered by which that particular amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment referred to will be considered as open. Does the Senator from Wisconsin ask to disagree to that amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask that that amendment be disagreed to. I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania in charge of the bill is willing to have that done, so far as he is concerned.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, as I said the other day, I am not in charge of this bill. This bill is, I think, properly in charge of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who has reported it. I merely called it up and have done some work in connection with it at his request. What I have stated to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] before he left the Chamber, and what I have said to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], is that personally I see no objection to restoring the words "and other." It seems to me that the bill is more liberal to the corporation with the words restored than it is with them stricken out.

Mr. NELSON. I will briefly state to the Senate the reason why the words "and other" were stricken out. It was made to appear to the committee—and we had several hearings on the subject—that in the construction of the canal the company oftentimes might be obliged temporarily to secure additional funds. In the first instance, they would issue a given quantity of bonds to build the canal, and then, as the work progressed from time to time, they might find it necessary to incur indebtedness for temporary purposes; but with the words "and other" in the bill they would be absolutely cut off from doing so if their bonded "and other" indebtedness exceeded the amount named in section 3. For that reason I think those words ought to be stricken out.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the words "and other" are retained in the bill, I am wholly unable to see that the provision of section 3 limiting the indebtedness that may be incurred to $800,000 per mile will preclude the canal company from enlarging that indebtedness. Certificates may be issued which, so far as making a charge upon this property is concerned, would be just as binding as would be the bonds that are to be issued.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 4, page 4, line 8, after the word "impaired," to insert

"nor shall any dividend be paid by the issue of additional capital stock;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That no dividends shall be declared or paid whereby the capital of the company shall in any manner be reduced or impaired; nor shall any dividend be paid by the issue of additional capital stock.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, page 4, line 20, after the words "city of," to strike out "Pittsburg" and insert "Pittsburgh;" and in line 25, after the words "vote of," to strike out "those present" and insert "the capital stock represented;" so as to read:

SEC. 6. That as soon as at least $5,000 of stock for every mile of canal proposed to be constructed is subscribed and paid for in cash, the incorporators named herein, or a majority of them, shall call a general meeting of the shareholders, to be held in the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., for the purpose of electing a board of directors of said company, consisting of not less than nine of the shareholders, and of transacting any other business that may be done at a shareholders' meeting. At such meeting the shareholders shall decide by a majority vote of the capital stock represented, either in person or by proxy, the length of the term or terms of the directors, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, page 5, line 25, before the word "make," to strike out "to" and insert "may;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That the directors of said company, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, shall hold office until their successors shall have been elected and qualified. They shall elect a president, secretary, and treasurer and may provide for such other officers and employees as may be deemed advisable, and may make by-laws for the control and management of the works, property, and business of the said company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, page 6, line 4, after the words "city of," to strike out "Pittsburg" and insert "Pittsburgh;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 8. That the main office of the company shall be at the city of Pittsburgh, in the State of Pennsylvania, and the annual meeting of the shareholders shall be held on the third Tuesday of January in each year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, to strike out section 9, as follows:

SEC. 9. That the said company shall be subject to the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the same as if it were a railroad corporation, and shall make such sworn statements and reports as may be required by the said Commission.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 9. That Congress hereby reserves the right to regulate the tolls, fares, and rates to be charged by said company for the use of said canals; and the said company and the said canals and all transportation thereon shall be subject to all the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts supplemental thereto and amendatory thereof now or hereafter enacted.

Mr. NELSON. Before that amendment is acted upon I desire to move to amend the committee amendment by the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the new section 9, page 6, line 13, after the word "regulate," it is proposed to insert "as to interstate and foreign commerce;" and in line 15, after the word "all," to insert the words "interstate and foreign;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. That Congress hereby reserves the right to regulate as to interstate and foreign commerce the tolls, fares, and rates to be charged by said company for the use of said canals; and the said company and the said canals and all interstate and foreign transportation thereon shall be subject to all the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts supplemental thereto and amendatory thereof now or hereafter enacted.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 10, page 6, line 20, after the word "to," to strike out "lay out, construct, maintain, and operate a" and insert "survey, ascertain, locate, fix, mark, and determine a route for a ship;" in line 24, before the word "Pennsylvania," to strike out "Pittsburg" and insert "Pittsburgh;" on page 7, line 4, before the word "accessible," to strike out "the most" and insert "an;" in line 10, after the word "near," to insert "Niles, Ohio; thence along the Mahoning River, in the State of Ohio, to a point at or near;" in line 12, after the word "Ohio," to insert "and thereupon and therein to erect, construct, maintain, and operate such canals;" in line 17, before the word "construct," to insert "to;" in line 24, before the word "forty-five," to insert "not less than;" and in line 25, before the word "twelve," to insert "not less than;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 10. That the company is hereby empowered to survey, ascertain, locate, fix, mark, and determine a route for a ship canal from some point on the Ohio River, between Beaver, Pa., and Pittsburgh, Pa.; thence by the way of the Ohio, Beaver, and Mahoning rivers in the State of Pennsylvania, and the Mahoning River in the State of Ohio, to a point at or near Niles, Ohio; thence northwardly through the State of Ohio to an accessible harbor on Lake Erie, between the Pennsylvania and Ohio State line and the mouth of the Grand River, in the State of Ohio, including said river, also a branch canal from the mouth of the Shenango River, in the State of Pennsylvania; thence along the Shenango River to a point at or near Sharon, Pa.; also a branch canal from a point at or near Niles, Ohio; thence along the Mahoning River in the State of Ohio to a point at or near Warren, Ohio; and thereupon and therein to erect, construct, maintain, and operate such canals; the said main canal connecting the Ohio River and Lake Erie to be of such dimensions as to make and construct navigable channels of at least 12 feet in depth and having a standard cross section of not less than 1,800 square feet of area; to construct, maintain, and operate all such locks, dams, towpaths, basins, tunnels, aqueducts, feeders to supply water from any lakes, rivers, streams, or water courses, reservoirs, cuttings, apparatus, appliances, and machinery as may be necessary for the construction and operation of said canals; and such locks on such main canals shall not be less than 340 feet long between quoins, not less than 45 feet wide between lock walls, and not less than 12 feet depth of water over miter sills, and between the Ohio River and Lake Erie the total lockage shall not exceed 600 feet.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 11, page 8, line 5, after the word "may," to insert "at its own expense and subject to and in conformity with the laws of the States, respectively, through which said canals may be constructed;" in line 9, after the word "canals," to insert "feeders;" in line 10, after the word "authority," to insert "at its own expense and subject to and in conformity with the laws of the States, respectively, through which said canals may be constructed;" in line 14, before the "railroads," to insert "waterways;" in line 16, after the word "canals," to insert "feeders;" and in line 17, after the word "company," to strike out "and whenever in the making, maintaining, and operating of the canals and other works of the company it shall be necessary to alter any highway, railroad, or other works, either public or private, and the said canal company and the owners of such highway, railroad, or other works can not agree as to the character, method, and terms of such alteration, and there are no laws of the State in which the alteration is proposed applicable thereto, then the same shall be determined by the district court of the United States of the district in which the alteration is proposed, and the district courts of the United States in the district through which the canal herein authorized shall run are hereby clothed with jurisdiction to hear and determine such disputes, under such rules as said courts may prescribe, and to fix the character, method, and terms upon which the alteration shall be made;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 11. That the said company, in the exercise of its right of eminent domain as granted in section 2 of this act may, at its own expense and subject to and in conformity with the laws of the States, respectively, through which said canals may be constructed, enter upon and take such lands as are necessary and proper for the making, maintaining, and operating of the canals, feeders, and other works of the company hereby authorized, and it shall have the authority, at its own expense and subject to and in conformity with the laws of the States, respectively, through which said canals may be constructed, to alter any and all highways, waterways, railroads, and other works, either public or private, necessary for the making, maintaining, and operating of the canals, feeders, and other works of the company.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting in line 7, page 8, after the words "may be constructed," the words "and with their legislative consent;" so that the section down that far will read as follows:

That the said company, in the exercise of its right of eminent domain as granted in section 2 of this act, may, at its own expense and subject to and in conformity with the laws of the States, respectively, through which said canals may be constructed, and with their legislative consent enter upon, etc.

Mr. NELSON. I have no objection to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 12, page 9, line 10, after the word "may," to insert "subject to the rights of the States, respectively, through which said canals shall pass, or any of the municipalities thereof affected thereby, to regulate and control the same;" in line 14, after the word "said," to strike out "canal" and insert "canals, feeders, and other works;" in line 18, after the word "canals," to insert "feeders;" in the same line, before the word "works," to insert "other;" on page 10, line 3, after the word "said," to strike out "canal" and insert "canals, feeders;" and in the same line, after the word "and," to insert "other;" so as to read:

SEC. 12. That the said company in the exercise of its right of eminent domain as granted in section 2 of this act may, subject to the rights of the States, respectively, through which said canals shall pass, or any of the municipalities thereof affected thereby, to regulate and control the same, obtain, take, and use for the construction and operation of the said canals, feeders, and other works from the rivers, lakes, brooks, streams, water courses, ponds, reservoirs, and other sources of water supply sufficient water for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, operating, and using the said canals, feeders, and other works hereby authorized; control and regulate the flood waters of the Allegheny River above Franklin, Pa., and the Beaver, Mahoning, Grand, Ashtabula, Shenango, and Little Shenango rivers, and Sandy Creek, and the tributaries of said streams by regulating dams, weirs, reservoirs, and impounding dams, and divert, alter, or impound the waters of any river, lake, brook, stream, and the tributaries of said streams or water courses when the same is necessary to the making, maintaining, and operating of the said canals, feeders, and other works hereby authorized.

Mr. CLAY. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that the amendment is not exactly in conformity with the amendment of section 11. This reads, "subject to the rights of the States." I would suggest to the Senator the language "subject to and in conformity with the laws of the States."

Mr. NELSON. I have no objection to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CLAY. I move that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 10, after the words "rights of," it is proposed to insert "and in conformity with the laws of."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] that the same amendment which he offered to section 11 is important in section 12 in order to make it harmonious.

Mr. MORGAN. I had not read the bill that far. I hope the Senator will propose it.

Mr. BACON. I would prefer that the Senator would do it. The same language which was inserted before the word "enter," in line 7, on page 8, would cover it.

Mr. NELSON. It reads, "subject to the rights of the States," and the amendment has put in "and in conformity with the laws of the States."

Mr. BACON. I understand that. "In conformity with the laws of the States" does not cover the distinct consent of the State to the exercise of the right of eminent domain, as is provided in section 11. Let the Secretary read the language of the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama to the eleventh section.

The SECRETARY. After the words "States, respectively, through which said canals may be constructed" the words were added "and with their legislative consent."

Mr. BACON. If the words "and with their legislative consent" are inserted at this point, it will make it harmonious.

Mr. NELSON. I have no objection, although it is tautology, since the amendment of the junior Senator from Georgia has been adopted.

Mr. BACON. I do not think so. I may be in error, but the other section refers to the method in which it shall be done, and there legislative consent is required.

Mr. KNOX. It seems to me that the amendment proposed by the senior Senator from Alabama protects that entirely. The other section provides the circumstances under which they may condemn in a State, and it is made subject to the legislative consent of the State, and this section is simply with respect to the exercise of that power.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator thinks that limitation applies to the twelfth as well as the eleventh section, I will not insist upon an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia offer an amendment?

Mr. BACON. No. Under the construction placed upon it by the Senator from Pennsylvania, I will not offer the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 10, line 7, after the word "the," to strike out "reasonable requirements of such city, village, or municipality" and insert "normal minimum discharge cross-section area of any such river or stream;" so as to read:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize said company to impair the navigability of any river or stream, or to diminish at any time the water supply of any city, village, or municipality below the normal minimum discharge cross-section area of any such river or stream, or in any manner to pollute the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, section 12, line 10, after the word "same," to insert:

Provided, That no feeders to supply water shall be connected with or draw water from the Niagara River above the Niagara Falls.

Mr. SPOONER. That amendment was moved by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is absent. He gave notice of a substitute for the proviso, which I agreed to offer for him, and which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the committee amendment it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That no water shall be drawn for the purposes of said canal, its branches or feeders, from above Niagara Falls, unless approved and allowed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. NELSON. I have no objection at all to that amendment. I want to say that the canal company does not expect to draw any water from Lake Erie more than the water that will naturally come up to the first lock.

The summit level is way in the interior, and they can not well draw water from Lake Erie. You can put the Niagara amendment in any form you want. It will not affect the bill one way or the other.

Mr. BACON. I am very glad to hear that from the Senator from Minnesota. Therefore I suggest certain amendments to the amendment, simply with a view of perfecting it. The printed amendment which I have is not that which was read from the desk, and I am not able——

Mr. SPOONER. It provides that—

No water shall be drawn for the purposes of said canal, its branches, or feeders, from above Niagara Falls, unless approved and allowed by the Secretary of War.

That is the only change.

Mr. BACON. I suggest the words "either from Niagara River or its tributaries." I will state that that is substantially the language in the bill we have already passed on this subject.

Mr. SPOONER. I am only offering it for the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BACON. I understand.

Mr. SPOONER. I have no objection to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BACON. I move to insert "either from Niagara River or its tributaries."

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I have not finished. Then I propose to add at the end of the amendment these words:

Provided, That no greater amount of water shall be diverted from Niagara River or its tributaries above Niagara Falls than shall be specified in any general law of the United States limiting the same.

I do not specify the bill which we have already passed, as it has not yet become a law. Therefore, I can not do it as we usually do. I am compelled to speak of the bill in general terms. Otherwise I would specify the law in the usual way.

Mr. SPOONER. In the bill which has been passed the amount of water that may be drawn from Niagara River was indicated, and the Secretary was authorized to issue permits for various manufacturing establishments. This would conflict with that.

Mr. BACON. This would conflict with that?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. The bill or this amendment?

Mr. SPOONER. This amendment.

Mr. BACON. Not at all. That refers to a particular bill.

Mr. SPOONER. That bill refers to a certain quantity of water which may be drawn from Niagara River for manufacturing purposes.

Mr. BACON. For any purpose.

Mr. SPOONER. And for other purposes.

Mr. BACON. For any purpose.

Mr. SPOONER. If this canal should draw any water from Niagara River, it would to that extent limit the amount which the bill passed by the Senate authorized to be used by these manufacturing establishments.

Mr. BACON. As I understood the Senator from Minnesota, it is not the design to take any water from the Niagara River.

Mr. SPOONER. Then what is the object of the amendment?

Mr. BACON. To guard it in case others differ with him in that view as to the intention. If the bill which we have passed is to be effective——

Mr. SPOONER. I shall not contest it. The bill will go into conference, and there will be carefully considered. I do not object to the amendment to the amendment, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, it is perfectly absurd to put a provision in this bill that water shall not be taken from Niagara River. You might just as well say it should not be taken from the moon, for unless there is some new method of gravitation which will carry the water uphill it can not be done. It can not be done by any method I know of. I dislike to see go into a bill a statement so absurd, and there is no one who is familiar with that section of the country—and I am very familiar with it—does not know that it is not possible to get water out of Niagara into this proposed canal.

The headwaters of the Allegheny River, if this canal strikes the Ohio where the bill says it shall, which is in Trumbull County, at Niles, a county immediately south of Ashtabula County, which is on the lake, it will be 50 miles from the lake where it strikes Niles—40 or 50 miles. It will be then a hundred miles, at least 75 miles, from Niagara River. Water could be put into the canal from Allegheny River. The Allegheny rises in western New York. Some of the branches rise in Chautauqua and some in Cattaraugus County. There is a high divide between that and the water which runs into Niagara River, a divide that never could be cut across with a canal, and there is not water enough on top of the divide to put in a canal or to make a feeder.

I speak with knowledge of this thing. I myself as a young man taught school in the neighborhood of the headwaters of the Allegheny River. I have been down the Allegheny River from its head to Pittsburg, and I have been to Chautauqua Lake. I know that country, and to say this would be just as absurd as to say that you shall not carry water uphill for the benefit of this canal.

We owe it to the people, when we enact a law, that at least on the face of it it should have the appearance of knowledge on our part of what we are doing, and I think a committee which would allow such a proposition to go into the bill could not have given very much attention to the geography of the country concerning which this inhibition is to be inserted.

Mr. President, I do not suppose it will make much difference. People in that country will look it over and probably say that the Senate is not possessed of very much knowledge of geography, and they will wonder, certainly they will have a degree of surprise and curiosity, why there should be so much interest in preventing the water in Niagara River from being utilized in the proposed canal. They are going to utilize the water in the lake. Nobody seems to make any objection to that. All the water in Lake Erie that is not evaporated goes out through the Niagara River. You can not use any water in this canal, as the Senator from Pennsylvania says, from the lake. There is a natural ridge all along from the Niagara River clear up to Cleveland. I doubt very much whether there is any place where you could cut a canal a half a mile from the lake where you could fill it with water. People who have been along that railroad which passes up the lake shore will, I think, recognize what I say to be the fact. I know the country whereof I speak.

While I am not very enthusiastic about this canal, and have some doubt whether it will every be built—I doubt whether it will be very valuable when it is built—I think it will be more valuable, perhaps, to those who build it and those who operate it in the time to come. However, that has nothing to do with it. I dislike to see such a provision inserted in the bill as if there was some sinister purpose in building this canal to get water out of that river. As I say, if there are any reasons why it should not be taken out of Niagara, the same reasons would operate as to Lake Erie, as Niagara is the outlet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the Senator from Georgia to the substitute.

The amendments to the amendment were agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 13, page 10, line 21, after the word "said," to strike out "canal" and insert "canals."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 14, page 11, line 6, after the word "buildings," to insert "feeders;" so as to read:

SEC. 14. That the said company may take, use, occupy, and hold, but not alienate, so much of the public beach or beach road, or lands covered with the waters of the rivers, lakes, brooks, streams, water courses, reservoirs, or ponds, on or at which the said canals may start from, traverse, cross, or terminate as may be necessary for the wharves, docks, piers, buildings, feeders, or other works of the company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 15, page 11, line 13, after the word "canals," to insert "feeders;" in line 21, after the word "canals," to insert "feeders;" and in line 22, before the word "works," to insert "other;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 15. That the company shall prepare and file with the Secretary of War, for his approval, the plans, locations, dimensions, and all necessary particulars of its canals, feeders, and other works between the Ohio River and Lake Erie, and before such approval the construction thereof shall not be begun; and should any change in said plans be proposed during the progress of construction, such change shall be submitted to the Secretary of War and be by him approved before such change shall be made. Upon notice of the approval of the Secretary of War, the company may forthwith begin the construction of its canals, feeders, and other works, or any part thereof, according to this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

That the said canals shall be open to the use and navigation of all suitable and proper vessels or other water craft, by whomsoever owned or operated, upon fair and equal terms, conditions, rates, tolls, and charges; and the said company may demand, take, and recover for its own proper use, for all persons and things of whatsoever description transported upon the said canals, feeders, and other works, or in vessels and craft using the same, just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative charges, rates, and tolls; but all such charges, rates, and tolls shall be equal to all persons, vessels, and goods under certain classifications to be established by the company; and no rebate, reduction, drawback, or discrimination of any sort on such charges, rates, and tolls shall ever be made directly or indirectly. And the said charges, rates, and tolls for the ensuing year shall be fixed, published, and posted on or in every place where they are to be collected on or before the 15th day of February of each year, and shall not be changed except after thirty days' public notice, which notice shall plainly state the changes proposed to be made in the charges, rates, and tolls then in force and the time when the changed charges, rates, and tolls will go into effect; and the proposed changes shall be shown by printing new schedules or shall be plainly indicated upon the schedules in force at the time and kept open to public inspection: Provided, That the Interstate Commerce Commission may, in its discretion and for good cause shown, allow changes upon less notice than herein specified or modify the foregoing requirements in respect to publishing and posting of such schedules, either in particular instances or by a general order applicable to special or peculiar circumstances or conditions.

Mr. NELSON. On page 17, line 11, in order to harmonize it with the rate bill, I move to strike out the words "and fairly remunerative" and to insert the word "and" between the words "just" and "reasonable."

Mr. FORAKER. I would suggest to the Senator that I read in the paper this morning that the conferees had agreed to strike out the words "fairly remunerative" from the rate bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 18, line 13, after the word "canals," insert "feeders;" so as to read:

SEC. 18. That the canals, feeders, and other works hereby authorized shall be lawful military and post routes, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 19, page 13, line 21, before the word "canals," to strike out "canal or some of the;" in line 23, after the word "company," to insert "shall;" in line 24, before the word "years," to strike out "six" and insert "three;" in line 25, before the word "years," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "ten;" so as to make the section read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 4, to strike out section 20, in the following words:

SEC. 20. That the Government of the United States may, at any time after fifty years from the opening of the canals to navigation, upon notice to said company of not less than one year, assume possession, control, and ownership of the said canals and their appurtenances and of all the rights and privileges thereunto belonging, full title to which shall, upon such assumption, be fully vested in the United States, and the United States shall thereupon pay to the said company the value of the same, to be ascertained and fixed by three arbitrators, or a majority of them, one of whom shall be appointed by the President of the United States, another by said Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal Company, and the third by the arbitrators thus selected, and said arbitrators, in fixing the value of the canals and work so acquired by the United States, shall not consider or allow any value for the franchise conferred by this act or for earnings or good will.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill why this section is to be stricken out?

Mr. NELSON. It was the sense of the subcommittee, and that suggestion was adopted by the full committee, that there might be an implication in that section that some day or other the Government would take this canal. Therefore we left it out. It might seem as though it was committing the Government to the idea of acquiring the canal some time in the future, and hence we left it out. If it is left out, it will be a matter in conference between the two Houses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 21, to change the number of the section from "21" to "20;" and in line 24, after the word "said," to strike out "canal" and insert "canals, feeders;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 20. That any person, association, or corporation, municipal or otherwise, which shall suffer any damage or loss to person or property by reason of the construction, operation, or maintenance of the said canals, feeders, or any of the works thereof, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 7, to change the number of the section from "22" to "21."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 15, to change the number of the section from "24" to "23."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 3, on page 4, insert the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal Company, its successors and assigns, shall issue only such amounts of stocks and bonds, coupon notes, and other evidences of indebtedness payable at periods of more than twelve months after the date thereof as the Interstate Commerce Commission may from time to time determine is reasonably necessary for the purpose for which such issue of stock or bonds has been authorized. And the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby authorized and empowered and it shall be its duty to determine, upon application, what issues of stocks, bonds, coupon notes, or other evidences of indebtedness may be reasonably necessary to pay the cost of construction, equipment, maintenance, and operation of said canals and works. Said Commission shall render a decision, upon an application for such issue, within thirty days after final hearing thereon, which decision shall be in writing, shall assign the reasons therefor, and shall, if authorizing such issue, specify the respective amounts of stocks or bonds or of coupon notes or of other evidences of indebtedness as aforesaid which are authorized to be issued for the respective purposes to which the proceeds thereof are to be applied. Such decision shall be filed in the office of the Commission, and a certified copy of such decision shall be delivered to the said canal company, which shall cause the same to be entered upon its records before any stocks, bonds, coupon notes, or other evidences of indebtedness thereby authorized are issued. Every certificate of stock, every bond, and other evidence of indebtedness of such canal company operating as a lien upon the property of such company which shall be made, issued, or sold without compliance with this act shall be void. Any officer or director of said canal company who shall knowingly make any false statement or shall withhold from the Interstate Commerce Commission any information requested by such Commission to procure the approval of said Commission to any issue of stocks, or bonds, or coupon notes, or other evidences of indebtedness shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in the United States district court of the district in which such offense is committed shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not less than two nor more than ten years, and shall likewise be liable to any creditor of such company for the full amount of damages sustained by such wrongful act.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is not my purpose at this late hour of the session to tax the patience of the Senate with any extended remarks upon the proposed amendment. Its purpose is plain.

The State of Massachusetts and the State of Texas provide by statute that no public-service corporation shall issue stocks and bonds except that it first submit to a designated State authority satisfactory evidence that there is actual value back of every dollar of the proposed issue of stocks and bonds. This amendment is drawn upon those statutes. I do not believe that it can be objected to in form. If objection be made to it at all it must be upon principle, and I can conceive of no valid objection which can be made to the amendment upon any principle.

The incorporators who are asking for this charter by the terms of the bill propose to issue $400,000 of stock and $400,000 of bonds for every mile of the canal from Lake Erie to the Ohio River. Once issued, the coal and iron and grain shipped through the canal will be charged tolls to pay interest on all the bonds and dividends on all the stock though it may not have cost half of $800,000 per mile to build, maintain, and operate the canal. This is the vice of allowing public-service corporations to issue stocks and bonds without any Government supervision, requiring the corporation to make satisfactory proof that every dollar of stocks and bonds represents actual bona fide investment.

If this canal will cost $800,000 per mile to build, it is an easy matter for those who are asking this charter at the hands of the Federal Government to make that plain to some authority of the Federal Government.

The transportation of this country is upon a false basis. The steam railroads, the street cars and interurban companies, the sleeping-car companies, the express companies, are—all of them, as is well known—overcapitalized and grossly inflated. The people are charged transportation rates high enough to pay dividends on all stock and interest on all bonds, notwithstanding the fact that more than 50 per cent of such stocks and bonds represent no investment whatever.

The difficulty in squeezing the water out after the stocks and bonds have been issued is at once manifest. You are at once encountered with the plea—a false one, as I contend—that the stocks and bonds have become the property of innocent purchasers.

But here we are at the outset of this proposed public enterprise, the building of this canal, and before the stocks and bonds are issued, before they have been sold, before there is any opportunity to put forth the claim that the stocks and bonds are in the hands of people who gave full face value for them, the Federal Government should be clothed with authority to make certain that these incorporators have invested in this canal the money for the stock and bonds issued. I believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission is the body to invest with authority to protect the public against overcapitalization.

I am not prepared to say that this canal will not cost $800,000 per mile to build, but with its several branches, aggregating over 225 miles, an issue of over $180,000,000 may be made by the corporation, no matter what the cost of the canal. This would seem excessive.

It was stated in the debate upon the isthmian canal that it would only cost $180,000,000 to build that great waterway for ocean vessels if we construct the lock and dam type. That canal is to be built 200 feet wide and with a depth of 40 feet. The depth proposed in the pending bill for this canal is, I think, only 12½ feet.

Mr. President, if the purposes of those who are back of this enterprise are clear and fair, and there is not an intention to have the capital of this canal company watered and inflated, then this amendment will not be objected to by them.

It is proposed, sir, that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall regulate the tolls and charges the commerce of the country must pay as it passes through this canal, and that they shall have authority to so limit those tolls and charges that they shall be reasonable. If they are to be given that authority, then you must make certain that there shall not be extravagant issue of stock and bonds upon which dividends and interest will have to be paid in excessive tolls by the public on its commerce.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I am sincerely and heartily in favor of the construction of this canal. I have been unwilling, however, to take up the time of the Senate needlessly in discussing what I consider the merits of it. My own State, bordering on Lake Superior, at the great city of Duluth, is vitally interested in this canal, and I should like to see the canal built as soon as possible.

I have no idea that the General Government will undertake it. If it is not undertaken by a corporation of this kind it is not likely to be built at all.

Now, to ingraft such an amendment upon the bill would hamper and distress the company and prevent them from carrying on their operations. The effect of the amendment is that the corporation could not organize, even, before the men interested in it would have to present the plans and specifications of the canal to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and show in advance what it would cost in order to lay the foundation for issuing the stock.

Now, under section 6 of the bill they are authorized to meet and organize as soon as $5,000 of stock for every mile shall have been subscribed. The effect of this amendment would prevent the corporations from being organized at all until they had prepared and submitted an estimate of what the probable cost of the canal would be, with all its appurtenances and appliances, a thing in the very nature of the case that they could not wholly do in advance.

Then, more than that, the amendment goes further and makes all the stock issued by them, unless in conformity with the provisions of the other part of the amendment, absolutely void in the hands of innocent purchasers.

This company, in order to build the canal, have got to raise money; they have got to raise it in the way money is raised for other enterprises in this country; and if you impose any such restriction as is attempted in the amendment you practically defeat the scheme.

Therefore I trust everyone who is in favor of the immediate construction of this canal will help to vote down the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator is entirely mistaken when he says that the amendment which I propose would interfere with the organization of this company and the subscription of its capital stock. It can embarrass no legitimate enterprise to show that it is prepared to make a valid bona fide investment.

Under a similar statute railroad companies are organized and roads constructed in the State of Texas; railroad companies are organized and roads built in Massachusetts. It imposes no restriction whatever upon the organization of the corporation and the subscription of its stock. It is a just provision, both to the corporation and to the people. Without it there is no protection against overcapitalization.

It was suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] earlier in this discussion that the bill sufficiently protected the public and the purchasers of stocks and bonds in the proviso contained in lines 19, 20, and 21, page 3, section 3, which is as follows:

Provided further, That in no event shall the stock issued and debt created be more than may be necessary to construct, equip, maintain, and operate said canals and works pursuant to and in compliance with all the provisions of this act.

That is the usual provision found in such bills, and imposes no restraint whatever. There is no penalty attached to the issue of stocks and bonds in excess of the amount that is necessary. It is very easy for the organizers and promoters of this scheme to fix a fictitious value upon the franchise and upon the prospective earnings of the proposed canal, and issue stocks and bonds that are nominally within the terms of those lines, and yet which are in excess, and grossly and criminally in excess, of the fair value of the property.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I do not want to be censured, either in words or silently, for detaining the Senate at this late hour, and yet I wish to occupy enough time to give some pretty well defined views that I entertain about this bill. If the Senator in charge of the bill would be willing to let it go over until to-morrow, I should be very glad to have that course adopted.

Mr. PENROSE rose.

Mr. NELSON. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania to make a request for unanimous consent that the consideration of the bill shall be resumed to-morrow morning.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent, then, in deference to the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado, that the bill may be taken up for consideration immediately after the routine morning business to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the pending bill, H. R. 14396, be taken up immediately after the routine morning business to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, June 16, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 15, 1906.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m., and was called to order by Mr. ALEXANDER MCDOWELL, its Clerk, who laid before the House the following letter:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 15, 1906.

I hereby designate Hon. JOHN DALZELL, of Pennsylvania, to act as Speaker pro tempore.

J. G. CANNON, Speaker.

Mr. DALZELL accordingly assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow be substituted for war claims instead of to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that to-morrow be substituted for to-day for the consideration of business of the Committee on War Claims. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. WATSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill. The Chair desires to state that last evening when the committee rose there was an amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia pending. The Chair stated that the amendment would be pending at this sitting of the committee this morning.

Mr. TAWNEY. Let the amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. It was simply a pro forma amendment, to strike out the last word; but the Chair announced that that would be considered as pending this morning. The gentleman from Georgia is not present; it is not the fault of the committee, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Opinions of the Attorney-General: To enable the Attorney-General to employ, at his discretion, and irrespective of the provisions of section 1765 of the Revised Statutes, such competent person or persons as will, in his judgment, best perform the service, to edit and prepare for publication and superintend the printing of volume 25 of the Opinions of the Attorney-General, $500; the printing of said volume to be done in accordance with the provisions of section 383 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I offer the following new paragraph as an amendment to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

To systematize the preparation of law indexes, etc., and to provide trained law clerks therefor: To enable the Librarian of Congress to direct the law librarian to prepare a new index to the Statutes at Large, in accordance with a plan previously approved by the Judiciary Committees of both Houses of Congress, and to prepare such other indexes, digests, and compilations of law as may be required for Congress and other official use, $5,840, to pay for five additional assistants in the law library, one at $1,800, one at $1,200, one at $900, and two at $720 each, and for the law librarian, $500, the said sum to be paid to the law librarian notwithstanding section 1765 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not understand that there is any objection to the adoption of the amendment, and that being the case, I shall not take time unless an explanation is desired.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the gentleman, does this amendment interfere in any way with the provision that has been adopted, as I understand in a preceding Congress, providing for codification of the laws?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; this amendment, or this provision, will provide for a scientific indexing of legislation up to date. It proposes to authorize clerks for that purpose. I have the data here in detail, I would say to the gentleman. It does not interfere with the code or the consolidation or revision. That legislation, as I remember it, simply provides for a revision. When revised, the men revising will probably take care of the index.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it the intention that this amendment the gentleman offers shall not go into effect until the revision takes place, so that they will index the revision rather than the law as it stands now?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. This will go into effect at once. We have to-day thirty-three volumes of the Statutes at Large. There is no scientific index of them. No matter what the revision may be, the gentleman full well understands it will always be necessary to consult these thirty-three volumes to get an intelligent idea of what the law is. All we have to-day in connection with these thirty-three volumes is a separate index for each volume, which is very inartistic and unscientific. This would enable these three clerks and two stenographers to begin work and make a scientific index of these volumes, for instance, to bring it up to date. There was an effort made to produce an index of all the laws and have it published as what is called a "consolidated index." As a matter of fact, all there is of that consolidated index is simply the work of taking the separate indexes of these thirty-three volumes and with scissors and paste putting them together. While it is absolutely unscientific, it is better than the existing thirty-three indexes only, because it puts them all in one book. It does not give any idea of what legislation has been repealed and what legislation may be inconsistent—in fact, practically it is of no value so far as giving an intelligent understanding of what the law is. Now, it turns out, on investigation, that there has been going on, in connection with a number of the bureaus of the Government where they have legal work, a large amount of indexing on their own account; so that there has been indexing going on in various Departments, and under this provision we will have these consolidated and no duplication of the work. Let me give an illustration——

Mr. NORRIS. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to suggest——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD (continuing). Last summer, when the Landis Commission wanted all the laws relating to the work of the Public Printer, a full index had to be prepared by the young woman who catalogues the documents under the superintendent of documents, and it was a very unscientific and unsatisfactory work, as well as expensive. Now, the purpose is to have all the indexes of the legislation and the works of the various Departments combined down here in the law library, where it can be reached, where the work can be done accurately, and where we can get rid of the duplication of the work of these various Departments.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Maine that I heartily agree with him that we ought to have some method of indexing by which we can find the laws passed by Congress, but it occurred to me that we had provided in some way by a resolution or by a law passed here that one of the committees of the House should revise the statutes that they have already reported, as far as the criminal code is concerned. If that is true——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It is not true. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] will explain.

Mr. NORRIS. Would the index proposed by this amendment be applicable to the revision that is to be made by this committee; and if it would not, what is the use of it?

Mr. HOAR. The commission is now authorized by special act to codify the laws and to prepare an index, and that index is about half done, for the revision of the laws. That will be completed under the authority of that Commission, but this proposition of the gentleman from Maine will not affect that at all.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the use of having two indexes?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. In the first place, the index of the revision of the laws has no relation whatever, not the slightest, as a legal proposition or as a proposition of fact, to the indexes proposed in this amendment. To illustrate, the index spoken of by the gentleman from Massachusetts would give you no index at all for the thirty-three volumes of the Statutes at Large, and by it you couldn't find a thing in it. Now I will read briefly what is really proposed by the amendment, and then I will be glad to answer any questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that he may have his time extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Before the gentleman begins to read I want to ask him a question. If we are to have, as we propose to have, a complete index of the statutes of the United States, would it not be better to have the index project carried over to the end of this Congress so as to include this legislation, and let the index be a compound index of both the new codification and the reference to the old?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I think not, and I will explain why.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It seems to me that it is wholly premature to organize another commission to index the statutes which for practical purposes have become obsolete.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The thirty-three volumes of the Statutes at Large never will become obsolete. The revision simply gives the public statutes as they exist to-day. Of course the thirty-three volumes of the Statutes at Large contain a vast amount of legislation, private in its character, and also public in its character, and that law will not appear at all in the revision, and there is absolutely no index of any value to those thirty-three volumes. No matter how complete the index is to the Revised Statutes, you will have no index whatever to the legislation enacted in previous years and included in the thirty-three volumes of the Statutes at Large.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why not make it all at one time? Index the law as it stands to-day, and refer to the law in the Statutes at Large under one title.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I think it would be impracticable to make an index of that kind. For instance, the index to the revision of 1878 which we have gives no reference whatever to the Statutes at Large for the various years. I never saw an index of that kind, and I think it would be incongruous to attempt to make one. Now, I will read the general scope of the proposition:

Plan to systematize the compiling, digesting, and indexing of law for Congress and the Executive Departments.

I. PROPOSED PLAN AND PURPOSE.

Employ three trained law indexers in the law library in the Capitol at $1,800, $1,200, and $900, and two stenographers at $720 each.

Prepare a standard scheme of classification for the Federal statute law. The classification scheme of the Century Digest, which cost the West Publishing Company $20,000, is rapidly becoming the standard for indexing the case law of the country. A standardized classification will be a time saver for all who consult the statutes.

Index anew the 33 volumes (35,390 pages) of the Statutes at Large (including joint resolutions, treaties, proclamations), and thus make it possible to gather quickly and accurately all the law on any particular topic. All who use the existing indexes, made by different persons at different times during a century, each following his own ideas as to classification, are subjected to endless search and uncertainty. By omitting altogether or by printing in small type the index to private acts (pensions, claims, etc.), a handy, compact index to the 33 volumes of the Statutes at Large can be prepared.

Make it possible for the Members of Congress, their clerks, and secretaries to utilize readily the detailed knowledge of Federal law, its phraseology, etc., which a small group of trained indexers would gain by giving their undivided attention to such work. This knowledge, together with the card records, compilations, and digests, being easily accessible in the law library, could be utilized during the legislative session to advantage.

Gradually centralize in the law library the compiling, digesting, and indexing of the particular topics of the law which are needed regularly or occasionally by the committees of Congress, the bureaus and divisions of the Executive Departments.

Utilize the large collections of American and foreign law in the law library instead of multiplying the development of law libraries in so many bureaus, divisions, and offices of the Executive Departments.

Make the law library a clearing house, as it were, for both the printed and unprinted compilations, digests, and indexes which are prepared, and thereby provide against wasteful duplication and furnish a central point from which all officers of the Government may secure prompt and accurate information on all such matters.

Make it possible for the sudden and occasional need for this sort of law work to be promptly, economically and accurately satisfied, e. g., when the Landis Commission wanted all the law relating to the work of the Public Printer this summer the compilation and index had to be prepared by the young women who catalogue documents at the office of the superintendent of documents.

II. NECESSITY FOR SYSTEM.

The aggregate amount of compiling, digesting, and indexing of law on various topics which is now done for the various bureaus, divisions, etc., of the Executive Departments and the committees of Congress requires an average annual expenditure for services alone of nearly $15,000.

An excessive price is now paid for service because it is customary to employ persons already in the Government service. They sandwich in the compiling, indexing, etc., at night and other odd times, and the value of their service is based on the number of months or years over which the work has been prolonged, e. g., three years are claimed to have been spent by three or four persons in preparing the Consolidated Index to the Statutes at Large, whereas two persons, giving their whole time to the use of scissors and paste, could have done it in six or eight months.

Most of the compiling and indexing of law is at present done by amateurs, many of whom have had no law training, and have no familiarity with law literature, and no experience in the use of law reference books.

Great deal of valuable time now lost in endless search to find all the law on particular topics in the 35,390 pages of the Statutes at Large. Logically identical matter is indexed under various subject headings, and often without cross references. Many laws and parts of laws are not indexed. There exists no list of the laws expressly repealed, much less those repealed by implication.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine a question.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PERKINS. Does this provide for an index that is to be published or only for a card index?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It provides for a printed index as well as for a card index.

Mr. PERKINS. The result will be published in book form?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; from time to time.

Mr. PERKINS. This commission is to be a permanent commission or a force of clerks?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; so as to keep the current law index up to date.

Mr. PERKINS. How often does the gentleman from Maine suppose it would be published, or would it be a card index in the meantime that could only be consulted in Washington?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. To illustrate, my idea would be this: I think the index of the thirty-three volumes of the Statutes at Large would be published as soon as it was completed, or perhaps as soon as the thirty-fourth volume was published. Then as we had current legislation that required indexing the card index would be carried along with it in a scientific manner, and from time to time we would have an additional publication, so that it would be available for general use.

Mr. PERKINS. Why does the gentleman say that this would necessarily stop the work of the Department in their indexing, would they be furnished with a card index?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PERKINS. Would they be content with that?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I can't absolutely say, but if Congress adopts a general plan and makes a clearing house where men can scientifically do the work, I do not believe the Departments would go on and duplicate it.

It would be entirely unnecessary for them to undertake to duplicate it, for they could get better work by the central organization here in the law library than could be done by their own employees. I do not think there is any reason to assume that they would attempt to make indexes on their own account, and thus get a poorer index, in order to make the law that relates to the various bureaus available for their daily use.

Mr. PERKINS. May I ask the gentleman, without any impropriety——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Oh, certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. If this scheme of indexing, in its general features, in reference to which he has consulted with the Librarian of Congress, meets with his approval?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes; it meets with the approval of the Librarian of Congress; it meets with the approval of the Assistant Attorney-General for the Post-Office Department, it meets with the approval of the chief law officer of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and I think my friend from Nebraska [Mr. KENNEDY] has a very vigorous letter from the Attorney-General of the United States, who also approves of it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask the gentleman two or three questions.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is not this commission that was appointed to codify the laws, and that undertook to revise them, doing this same identical work?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Not at all.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is there not some kind of a commission that we had a wrangle about here four or five weeks ago, making some sort of an index of all the acts passed by Congress?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What was that ?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; they are simply making a private-bill index. I did not know that there was any such legislation, but the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] tells me they are simply making a private-bill index.

Mr. PERKINS. Your index will not cover private bills at all, will it?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No. It will scientifically cover the thirty-three volumes of the Statutes at Large.

Mr. PERKINS. Private bills as well as public bills?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I imagine so.

Mr. MANN. Not private bills, but private laws. The gentleman said "private bills."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Private laws.

Mr. PERKINS. Would they index a pension bill, for instance?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If pension bills or private claims were carried along in the general index, it would take up an immense space in the index, and they would not be carried along, I should say, in the scientific manner that is proposed to be employed by these clerks, in the general index of the public laws; that is, they would not cumber up the general index of the public laws with an index of private claims and pension bills. Of course, it is entirely true that people may want to ascertain what private bills have been passed, and that information ought to be available, and undoubtedly will be available, but not in this index of the public laws. Under this, very likely and very properly, they might have an index of private laws.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If we establish this commission, what assurance have we that it will not be a continuing and perpetual performance?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I am inclined to think, if the gentleman from Missouri will excuse me, that it ought to be. It is not a commission, or a bureau, but it simply authorizes the employment of three additional clerks in the law library, with two stenographers. They can be cut off at any time, and if one can do the indexing that is necessary, and that we all concede we ought to have——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. There is no question about it. It is not a permanent appropriation. It is an appropriation simply for this year. If they get their indexing up to date, and these clerks are not necessary, why, they can be cut off on any subsequent appropriation bill. If one clerk, for instance, can keep the scientific indexing up to date, we can regulate and control the matter by simply appropriating for one clerk; only the idea is to have some system for keeping the index up to date after they have completed the indexing now on hand, so that it will be current, and I have no doubt the gentleman will say that is entirely proper.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think it ought to be kept up, but here now you go and appropriate for one year.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Can they do all that work in one year or not?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I doubt if they can. They can not bring it up to date in one year. Let me give the gentleman an illustration. A scissors-and-paste index—and that is what first called my attention to this need—has been made now of the thirty-three volumes, and there was an estimate made in the State Department that the value of the work for doing that simply by the use of scissors and paste—and the gentleman who made the estimate did not know how it was done, did not understand the lack of scientific value—was from ten to fifteen thousand dollars. Now, these three clerks and two stenographers could undoubtedly make a scientific index of the same volumes in at least two years' time, and probably less, for which that estimate of something like from ten to fifteen thousand dollars was made, and make it valuable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would now like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, as I understand—and I ask the gentleman for information—an index has recently been made at a very great expense that everybody concedes to be valueless.

Mr. TAWNEY. It has not been paid for.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Nothing has been paid for that index as yet. It has been printed at great expense, but nothing has been paid as compensation for the making of it.

Mr. MANN. It has been made at great expense up to date?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is true.

Mr. MANN. And is valueless?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; I will not go quite so far as to say that. I do not think that can with propriety be said.

Mr. MANN. It is so nearly valueless that the gentleman already wishes to supersede it before it is paid for.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is right.

Mr. MANN. I should say that comes very near to being valueless in the gentleman's opinion. The gentleman's proposition is that he wishes to have some person who is scientifically able to make an index, prepare an index, of both the private and public laws comprised in the volumes of the Statutes at Large. Am I correct?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman not think that in any event, if we have a codification of the laws, the index of the codification and the index of the Statutes at Large ought to be made on the same lines, so that a person who becomes familiar with the index to the codification can find something he wants to find in the index to the Statutes at Large without learning the new system?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. There is something in the suggestion of the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. In other words, two different men never make an index in the same way.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Let me call the gentleman's attention to this fact. The Commission that is now in charge of the revision of the statutes is making an index of that revision. They go out of existence unless Congress increases their tenure as soon as they complete that work. Of course the gentleman concedes, because every gentleman who is intelligent on the subject will, that a proper index is necessary of these thirty-three volumes of the Statutes at Large. Of course that is one of the great things involved in this proposition.

Mr. MANN. I certainly will concede that if a proper codification of the laws is necessary a proper index to the codification is necessary, and if that codification is made in the proper manner, it will contain side notes on each page giving a history of every public statute, which itself is the best index possible of the public statutes.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Let me call the gentleman's attention to this, that many of the laws have been repealed and yet have their effect on existing cases. A codification, of course, does not show the history of the laws which have been repealed.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's suggestion is of value, but it came before I had finished my proposition. I have no doubt that there ought to be a method, an easy method obtained by which a person looking up a law can find the law in an index, but it seems to me that it would be almost a valueless piece of work to now propose to make an index to the Statutes at Large without including in that index the index to the codified laws and without having the index upon the same general schemes; and that in order to do that this matter ought to go to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. I think we ought to authorize them to sit during the recess. If you make an index to this now without including the codification, you omit the main statute that you want to cover—the principal statute at large of the public law—because you do not cover the codification. The man who looks at the index ought to be able to find the law in the codified law and in connection with that on the same general scheme ought to be able to find the law in the Statutes at Large.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will say to the gentleman frankly that while that may be his view of it, I have had occasion in my time to examine a great many indexes and I never saw one built on that plan. I have examined the index of the revised statutes of my State year after year, and we have in my State legislation annually, and I never found an index of the revised statutes that would give me the necessary light in searching out the legislation from year to year.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman did not listen with his usual acumen.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I beg pardon. That may be true, but I was endeavoring to do so.

Mr. MANN. I do not say that the index to the codification ought to include the index to the Statutes at Large, but I say that the Statutes at Large ought to include the index to the codification. It is a perfectly plain proposition, I think the gentleman will admit.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That the index of the Statutes at Large ought to include the index to the codification?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask, Mr. Chairman, for two minutes more.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. MANN. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that all debate upon the pending paragraph be closed in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that if the codification of the Statutes at Large is brought down to the date at which the index is concluded, it would be wiser if we would include the statutes which have been codified——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Oh, I do not think we ought to include that at all. I am under an entirely different impression. We have to-day the revision of 1878—that is, the Revised Statutes of the United States—and in the back part of that volume there is an index to the Revised Statutes of the United States, and that is all that that relates to——

Mr. MANN. And all that it ought to relate to.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. We have thirty-three volumes, or will have thirty-four, perhaps, when this index is completed, and all the index of those thirty-four volumes, if I am right, and I am under the impression I am, all that the index of those thirty-four volumes ought to relate to are those thirty-four volumes. I do not think, if the gentleman will excuse me for making a suggestion, it has any necessary or proper or legal connection with the index of the revision, and it seems to me it ought to be——

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman will see if the index is not completed until the law is codified it will necessarily include the index of the codified law, because that is one of the statutes which will be published as part of the session's laws. The index of the revision and the index to the Statutes at Large ought to be on the same scheme in regard to the same subject.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I appreciate the force of the gentleman's suggestion, but it is impracticable to take them that way. This Commission to revise is going out of existence as soon as they complete their work.

Mr. MANN. But I understood this Commission wants to sit during the recess.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Now, this present proposition, as I hearty approval of the Committee on Revision of the Laws. Revision of the Laws——

Mr. MANN. I do not so understand it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I so understand it, that it has the hearty approval of the Committee on Revision of the Laws. This index can have no earthly relation to the index made by the Commission. It is entirely independent and separate from it, and it is impracticable, if the gentleman will permit me, to include the two.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. MANN. I believe the time is mine.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine to have read at the desk in his time before the debate closes the Attorney-General's letter to me on this subject.

Mr. MANN. I will be very glad to have that printed in the RECORD.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Would it be asking too much to request the gentleman from Illinois to have the letter read in his time?

Mr. MANN. It would not be if the gentleman will wait until I make a suggestion. I understood the gentleman from Maine to say the Committee on the Revision of the Laws was in favor of this proposition.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I so understand.

Mr. MANN. I talked to two gentlemen the other day prominent on the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, including the chairman, and I did not so understand.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then I may be in error.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that the wisest thing to do, if we are going to permit this committee to sit during the recess, would be to let that committee consider this question. It is right in the line of their work, and let them ascertain what kind of an index we ought to have made and how it shall be brought about, without putting it in here where there may be a conflict.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. This amendment expressly provides——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I want the amendment read. I was not present when it was read before, and some other gentlemen would also like to hear it.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the letter written to me by the Attorney-General of the United States covering this matter be read to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that a letter addressed to him by the Attorney-General be read. Is there objection?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, we have consumed almost an hour on this proposition. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] will be again read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the letter referred to by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KENNEDY] be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the letter referred to by the gentleman from Nebraska be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, June 12, 1906.

Hon. JOHN L. KENNEDY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 7th instant, inclosing House resolution No. 538 relative "to the preparation of a thoroughly good index to the Statutes at Large and such other compilations, digests, and indexes as may be required from time to time for the use of Congress or other official use," and you are at liberty to say that I heartily indorse the object of your resolution.

A new index to the public acts and resolutions found in the thirty-three volumes of the Statutes at Large would, if thoroughly done, be of great use to this Department. It is frequently necessary, not only to know the existing law, but the statutes which preceded the existing law and the interpretation which the courts have given the earlier statutes, as, for example, the various bankruptcy laws.

As rapidly as the chapters of the new edition of the Revised Statutes are enacted they ought to be indexed by expert law indexers; and each year the new statutes of general and permanent interest ought to be indexed in accordance with the same general plan.

There is undoubtedly a certain quantity of compiling, digesting, and indexing of law required by the bureaus, etc., of the Executive Departments and the committees of Congress. Until a particular work is printed, few, if any, outside of the particular office in which it is prepared know about it. It is impossible to estimate accurately the present cost of this work, because it is prepared under so many different circumstances—special appropriations in some instances and regularly employed clerks at different salaries in other instances. If the work were systematized at some central point and placed in the hands of specially trained law clerks, it would undoubtedly be better and more economically done than it is at present.

Respectfully,

W. H. MOODY,
Attorney-General.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to again reporting the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD].

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 42.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address myself to the preceding section, and only for a minute or two, if the committee will not object, in reference to the enforcement of the antitrust law. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to return to the preceding section.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; for five minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will consent to it if it is to be simply a pro forma amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is all.

Mr. TAWNEY. For discussion?

Mr. BARTLETT. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I shall detain the committee but for a few moments. The enforcement of the antitrust law under the act of Congress specified in this section is a provision which I had the honor to offer and have placed upon the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill in December, 1902, which became a law February 25, 1903, and provided for an appropriation for the enforcement of the law against trusts. This law has been, in a measure, enforced since that time. In 1902 I offered an amendment appropriating only $250,000. That was met by an amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] increasing the sum to $500,000. I take the floor merely to call attention to the fact that while we appropriated $500,000 in 1902 there still remains, after paying—I will not say exorbitant, but large—salaries to attorneys and other officers of the Department of Justice in the prosecution of these trust companies, on March 17, 1903, unexpended $379,000 of this fund.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to say there is a little over $100,000 left. Forty-five thousand dollars has been appropriated out of that fund for the coal and oil investigation, and this bill carries an appropriation of $160,000 more out of that fund for the same purpose. The committee believing that this money was appropriated for the investigation of violations of the antitrust law, and as this investigation is now going on along that line, the money heretofore appropriated should be made available for that purpose.

Mr. BARTLETT. I agree thoroughly with the gentleman and the committee that they did the proper thing. I have no criticism to make of the committee, but I merely call attention to the fact that the amendment I offered for $250,000 four years ago nearly was ample to answer all the purposes that the Administration has undertaken to carry out in the enforcement of the antitrust law since then, and that the $500,000 provided for by the bill in 1902 was unnecessary. With the large sums spent in the investigation of the violations of the antitrust law, with the large sums paid to detectives for inquiring into these violations, and the large salaries paid to assistant attorneys and special attorneys the Administration has not yet been able to expend $250,000 that was provided in the amendment that I offered to the bill in 1902.

I will not say anything further in reference to that, Mr. Chairman, except to ask permission to incorporate in the RECORD the evidence of witnesses who appeared before the Committee on Appropriations and the statements made before that committee in the hearings, which I hold in my hand, in order to show the country what has been done with this sum, and the amount which has been spent and the manner it has been paid out. I ask that permission, Mr. Chairman. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The matter is as follows:

ENFORCEMENT OF ANTITRUST LAWS.

Mr. TAWNEY. Can you tell us how much money has been expended out of that special fund of $500,000?

Mr. GLOVER. I can not tell you; I don't know.

Mr. LITTAUER. We would like you to find out; you have the accounts, have you not, in your charge, the accounts of the Department?

Mr. GLOVER. Yes; I am chief of the division.

Mr. LITTAUER. I would like to have you make up a statement and send it to us as early as you can, covering all the expenditures included in the appropriation of $500,000, the balances which have been reappropriated from year to year, made available from year to year, that have taken place since the appropriation was made for the enforcement of the antitrust law.

Mr. GLOVER. Yes, sir.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The amounts paid, and to whom.

Mr. LITTAUER. Including, of course, the expenditures to the 1st of January from the time the amount was originally available.

Mr. KENNARD. The amount paid to each person?

Mr. LITTAUER. No; the amount paid each year, and in the fiscal year 1905, and for the half year of 1906.

Mr. KENNARD. The total amount.

Mr. LITTAUER. The total amounts for each year.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And we want the amount paid to each person.

Mr. TAWNEY. If it is practical.

Mr. GLOVER. We have a whole lot of necessary employees of the Government, but I don't think the committee would want to have all that in here; it may be a disclosure that you would not want. It might be a benefit to some of these antitrust people, who would be glad to know who was employed to run them out.

Mr. LITTAUER. Put it in as full shape as you think the proper interests of all concerned warrant.

ENFORCEMENT OF ANTITRUST LAWS.

The next is the enforcement of the antitrust laws.

Mr. FIELD. The estimate merely provides that the unexpended balance shall be made available for the next fiscal year. That has been on every year since the $500,000 appropriation was started.

Mr. SULLIVAN. What balance is there?

Mr. FIELD. The unexpended balance at present, after deducting the $40,000 transferred to the Interstate Commerce Commission, is $298,000. That is the unexpended balance to-day.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Up to what date?

Mr. FIELD. Up to to-day.

Mr. SULLIVAN. That is excluding the $40,000 for the Tillman-Gillespie resolution?

Mr. FIELD. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. That was $45,000, was it not?

Mr. FIELD. It was either $40,000 or $45,000.

The CHAIRMAN. You have submitted to the committee at this Congress a detailed statement of the expenditures out of the fund?

Mr. FIELD. Yes. That was incident to the urgent deficiency bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It was printed in full in the hearings on the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Is the Department of Justice now prosecuting any trust cases?

Mr. FIELD. I can hardly answer that. I am not familiar with just what prosecutions the Attorney-General is making or preparing to make. There are several cases under investigation, but in just what state the prosecutions are I could not answer.

The CHAIRMAN. One is the tobacco trust.

Mr. SULLIVAN. What is the status of the beef cases?

The CHAIRMAN. I do not know.

Mr. SULLIVAN. You are through with the beef cases now, unless Congress should grant an appeal?

Mr. FIELD. I understand so.

ENFORCEMENT OF ANTITRUST LAWS.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, January 16, 1906.

Hon. L. M. LITTAUER,
Chairman Subcommittee on Deficiency Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In response to a verbal request made by your committee of officials of this Department at a hearing on the urgent deficiency bill on Saturday last, the 13th instant, for a statement of the amounts expended under the appropriation for the enforcement of the antitrust laws, I have the honor to send you herewith a statement showing in detail the expenditures under this appropriation from March 17, 1903, to January 16, 1906, giving the names of the parties to whom payments were made and the date, purpose, and amount of payment.

Respectfully,

M. D. PURDY,
Acting Attorney-General.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 77 for the purpose of introducing an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask that the House hear the amendment before passing on my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to return to page 77 for the purpose of offering an amendment, which the Clerk will report for the information of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 77, line 18, add: "Private individuals or corporations may have the tests referred to in the last two paragraphs made under the United States authorities in charge by paying to the United States Government the actual cost of such tests, in accordance with the method and rules now in vogue for private testing at the Watertown Arsenal."

Mr. TAWNEY. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of United States district attorneys and expenses of United States district attorneys and their regular assistants, $475,000: Provided, That this appropriation shall be available for the payment of the salaries of regularly appointed clerks to United States district attorneys for services rendered during vacancy in the offices of the United States district attorney: Provided further, That clerks and messengers in the office of the United States district attorney for the southern district of New York shall hereafter be paid from this appropriation and subsequent appropriations for salaries and expenses of district attorneys, by the disbursing clerk of the Department of Justice, in such number and at such salaries as may be fixed by the Attorney-General, and that such office expenses of said district attorney as may be approved by the Attorney-General shall also be paid in the same manner and from the same appropriations as similar expenses in other judicial districts, notwithstanding the provisions of section 836, Revised Statutes.

Mr. OLMSTED. I offer an amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to reserve the point of order, beginning with the word "Provided," in line 25, page 144, and going to the end of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that as long as the point of order is reserved his amendment is not in order. The gentleman from New York reserves the point of order on that portion which the Clerk has just read, beginning with "Provided further," at the bottom of page 144.

Mr. PERKINS. That provision, Mr. Chairman, is not based on anything that is contained in existing law. But if the gentleman in charge of the bill can furnish an explanation of this change that is satisfactory to me, I shall not press the point of order. I do not understand the provision, and do not see why it should be made.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, this provision was inserted in the bill upon the recommendation of the Department of Justice or the Attorney-General. Mr. Glover, of the Department of Justice, when before the committee, made a very full statement in regard to the necessity for this legislation, and if the gentleman from New York will turn to page 1133 of the hearings he will see. A question was asked: "I observe that you recommend a change of law here."

Mr. GLOVER. Yes; that is made necessary. I also had a bill introduced in Congress, introduced by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate and the like committee of the House. The district attorney formerly was paid fees in the southern district of New York, but by a provision in the appropriation bill last year he became a salaried officer. Under section 834 of the Revised Statutes he was also entitled to expenses of his office, and he rendered monthly accounts. He does yet under the law, and he renders his accounts for what he pays for clerical assistance and other expenses. This is to make them paid like the same class of men in other districts—paid by the disbursing officer of the Department.

The CHAIRMAN. And is that the reason for the increase in your estimate above your present appropriation, from $440,000 to $475,000?

Mr. KENNARD. That does not affect the amount of the appropriation. That legislation would not change the amount of expenses in any way. It would merely provide a different way of paying them.

Mr. GLOVER. It would affect the amount paid from this appropriation. They are now paid from miscellaneous expenses of the United States courts.

Mr. SULLIVAN. So that hereafter his clerks and messengers would be paid directly, and not upon accounts by him?

Mr. GLOVER. Yes; as other salaried officers are paid by our disbursing officer, rather than have the district attorney pretend that he has paid all these clerks and had rendered an account as if he had actually paid them.

It was in the interest of better administration, and the committee felt that it should be enacted.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota whether, when the United States attorney for the southern district of New York was paid by fees, he paid out of his fees the salaries of those he employed, or were those employed paid by the General Government?

Mr. TAWNEY. The salaries of his assistants were paid out of the fees of the office heretofore.

Mr. PERKINS. While it was a salaried office?

Mr. TAWNEY. At the present time the district attorney is allowed to pay out the fees of the office, and he reports as having paid the miscellaneous expenses. Now, he simply renders an account of having paid so much miscellaneous expenses, and the disbursing officer of the Department of Justice allows him that amount. Now, this is for the purpose of requiring all the people employed in his office to be paid directly by the disbursing officer, and the disbursing officer will then know and the Department of Justice will then know whether he has these people actually employed or not.

Mr. PERKINS. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota that my objection to this change is not to the manner in which these expenses are to be paid by the disbursing officer, which may be a more convenient way; but the section also provides that the number of the clerks and employees in the office of the United States district attorney and their salaries shall be fixed by the Attorney-General. Is not that unusual?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it is not. It is true now in all the other districts.

Mr. PERKINS. In all district-attorney offices?

Mr. TAWNEY. My understanding is that it is true in all of them except this one. It is true, as my colleague suggests, of all these offices. Inasmuch as the expense account, the complete expense account, is allowed in a lump sum, they never know whether the full amount is expended or not. Now, this provision will give the Attorney-General the power to determine, first, how many clerks he shall have, how many assistants, and then fix their salaries, and they are paid by the disbursing officer of the Department of Justice, as all the other employees in all the other districts are paid.

Mr. PERKINS. Is it the case, for instance, in the northern district of New York that the number of clerks, the number of assistants, and their salaries are fixed absolutely in the power and by the judgment of the Attorney-General?

Mr. TAWNEY. That is absolutely true in every district in the United States except this one.

Mr. MANN. Absolutely true, except that it is governed by the amount appropriated for the purpose.

Mr. TAWNEY. Why, certainly; within the limit of the appropriation.

Mr. PERKINS. I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, then I offer the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after the word "Statutes," in line 12, page 145, the following: "And provided further, That section 2 of the act of June 30, 1902, being chapter 1335, as found in Statutes at Large, volume 32, part 1, page 549, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

Mr. TAWNEY. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I hope the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will not press the point of order. The amendment does not affect the integrity of his bill nor the amount of the appropriation at all. In my judgment, the amendment would not be subject to the point of order. The paragraph itself would have been subject to a point of order, and no point being made against the paragraph a point of order would not lie against any germane amendment to the paragraph.

Mr. TAWNEY. It does not carry any appropriation, does it?

Mr. OLMSTED. It does not.

Mr. TAWNEY. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not fully understand the object to be attained, and I reserve the point of order.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported. I was unable to understand it.

Mr. OLMSTED. I think I can state it. It has reference only to the place or places of keeping the records by the clerks in the middle district in Pennsylvania. It leaves that matter just where it was in the original act creating the district before the second section, which I propose to repeal, was injected into a special bill passed in 1902 and approved June 30, 1902, amending the act creating the district.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Does this in any way affect the district attorney's office of the southern district of New York?

Mr. OLMSTED. Not at all, nor in any other district.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio insist on his point of order?

Mr. KEIFER. I withdraw the point of order.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. OLMSTED, it was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fees of United States district attorney for the District of Columbia, $23,800.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to have some explanation from the gentleman in charge of the bill in reference to this provision. If I understand the law aright, apparently the district attorney of the District of Columbia receives as compensation a sum almost twice as large as the Chief Justice of the United States. Is that the law and is that the fact?

Mr. TAWNEY. He receives a salary of $5,500 a year.

Mr. PERKINS. Then explain to me what is meant by paying him $23,000 of fees.

Mr. TAWNEY. That covers all the expenses of his office.

Mr. PERKINS. How much are the expenses of the office? How much is the job worth, in other words? That is the question I should like to have answered.

Mr. TAWNEY. Five thousand five hundred dollars is all the money he can receive under the law.

Mr. PERKINS. What does he do with the $23,000 of fees?

Mr. TAWNEY. He must pay his office help out of it, and the balance is turned into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. PERKINS. That is the balance above the payment of what?

Mr. TAWNEY. His own salary and the salaries of his assistants and clerks. The balance is paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. PERKINS. Where is the provision of law that requires that? Because this bill gives over to him $23,800 of fees. What does he do with it, and where is the provision of law that requires him to turn it over?

Mr. TAWNEY. There is a general statute which expressly provides that he may retain out of the fees of his office his own salary of $5,500 and the salaries of his assistant attorneys, the salaries of his clerks and stenographers and messengers, and the balance, if any, shall be turned into the Treasury of the United States. That is the general statute.

Mr. PERKINS. Last year in this same bill the fees received by the district attorney of New York, which made that office a very enormous job, were abolished. I see the statute reads that in no case, except the District of Columbia, shall United States attorneys hereafter receive fees of office in addition to the salary provided by law. What was the object of that exception if, as the gentleman says, all that is done is the $23,000 is paid over to him and is by him paid back? Why is not the procedure in the District of Columbia made the same that it is in every other district, as I understand, in the country, and why, when the committee changed the law in reference to the southern district of New York, in order to prevent the district attorney getting an enormous compensation from fees, was an exception made of the District of Columbia? I can not understand it, if, as the gentleman says, he simply receives a salary, takes the fees, and pays them back again. Why should not the process be the same as in every other district in the country?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the office of United States district attorney of the District of Columbia is practically under the eye of the Attorney-General, under the eye of the disbursing officer, and it is very easy for the Attorney-General's office to determine whether or not the discretion he has in respect to employment, the payment of assistants and clerks is being abused or is not being abused, and I presume that is the reason. The gentleman has asked me to give reasons for legislation enacted many years ago. This I can't do, except by inference.

Mr. PERKINS. It was reported by the gentleman's own committee last year.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have no knowledge of the reasons for the legislation, although I am informed that there is a long story of Maryland politics behind it.

Mr. MUDD. I don't think the gentleman has any information about Maryland politics behind it, and such is not the fact.

Mr. PERKINS. The practical question is whether under the guise of this change, and the exception of the district attorney of the District of Columbia from the law which governs the other attorneys, the situation is like the one in the southern district of New York, which remained for years until the last Congress did away with it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Minnesota will permit, I will respond to the gentleman from New York by saying that the business of the district attorney for the District of Columbia is very different from that done in the southern district of New York. In the southern district of New York the United States district attorney is prosecuting strictly Federal offenses. In the District of Columbia he is prosecuting all classes of offenses. The result is that last year he disposed of 4,638 separate and distinct cases, compared with which the number of cases disposed of in the southern district of New York was very trifling. In order to handle 4,638 cases and finally dispose of them he had to have five assistant attorneys and an equal number of clerks. It must be that the gentleman from New York realizes that where a United States district attorney has to conduct all the police-court business by himself or deputy and all prosecutions of cases that would ordinarily be conducted by the State authorities, as well as Federal cases proper, it vastly increases the amount of business that he has upon his hands. But it doesn't seem to me that any of the salaries are too high or excessive.

Mr. PERKINS. As I understand, the district attorney for the District of Columbia receives for his own use $5,500?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. He fixes the salaries of his assistants?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No; I think the Department of Justice fixes those salaries. The salary of the first assistant is $2,650; the second assistant, $2,000; third assistant, $1,950; fourth assistant, $1,900, and the fifth assistant, $1,500. Now, I do not think this is an excessive force to handle the enormous number of petty cases that are in the charge of the United States district attorney.

Mr. PERKINS. There is not much of a surplus left.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No surplus.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I fully agree with the gentleman as far as he stated, but I would like to ask if this particular paragraph commencing with line 13—that is, fees to the amount of $23,800—is the total sum of the salary of all of the force including the Attorney-General. How do you arrive at that amount?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. As I understand, this is simply an aggregate of the salary of $5,500 for the district attorney and the salaries of the assistants which I have read, and the salaries of the clerks, which are one at $2,300, one at $1,800, one at $1,000, one at $900, and one at $600.

Mr. NORRIS. That answers my question.

Mr. PERKINS. Does this include the other expenses of the office?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No; I think not.

Mr. PERKINS. What is the total fees collected by the office?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I can not answer you that. What the other expenses of the office are I am not informed. I think they are paid out of an appropriation for the expenses of the district attorney's office, and I do not think it is covered by this item.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of regular assistants to United States district attorneys, who are appointed by the Attorney-General, at a fixed annual compensation, $225,000.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In view of some letters that I have received I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if this appropriation is the same as the appropriation for last year?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Exactly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman's question, I will say that recently during the consideration of the bill I was shown a letter purporting to have been written by the Attorney-General or from his office, stating in substance that certain things could not be done because the Committee on Appropriations had not allowed the increase in this appropriation, which he had estimated for. I hold in my hand a statement on page 282 of the committee print of the bill giving all of the estimates of the Department for that service from 1895 down to 1907, and also all of the appropriations, and the estimate for this year was $225,000, and the appropriation is identically the same amount. I do not know who wrote the letters. Somebody evidently was mistaken in saying that we had not allowed the amount which they had estimated. We have given them every dollar they have asked for in the annual estimates.

Mr. STERLING. That is the same letter I think that I received. I would like to ask the chairman another question. What assistant district attorneys does the Attorney-General appoint—all of them throughout the United States?

Mr. TAWNEY. My understanding is that he appoints all of them throughout the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of assistants to the Attorney-General and to United States district attorneys employed by the Attorney-General to aid in special cases, $90,000. This appropriation shall be available also for the payment of foreign counsel employed by the Attorney-General in special cases, and such counsel shall not be required to take oath of office in accordance with section 366, Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I see that in the appropriation bill of last year the amount for extra counsel was $85,000. Was that all expended?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; and more, too. There was a deficiency of about $40,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Why are all these special counsel employed in addition to the force the Government has and in addition to the appropriation made for the trust cases?

Mr. TAWNEY. One of the reasons is because of the trial of the Greene-Gaynor case, which occupied, I think, about two months and a half.

Mr. BARTLETT. Three months.

Mr. TAWNEY. And the preparation of that case, of course, occupied a great deal of time.

Mr. PERKINS. Additional counsel were employed in that case?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; and foreign counsel were also employed in order to get them over here. Practically all of that deficiency is due to that expense.

Mr. PERKINS. So the gentleman does not think there is any wastefulness in this item.

Mr. TAWNEY. No. We went into that very fully, and interrogated them, and they gave an itemized and detailed statement of all expenditures, and we satisfied ourselves that it was entirely proper.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Attorney-General shall hereafter, under rules and regulations prescribed by him, require the clerks af the United States circuit and district courts, clerks of the Territorial courts, clerks of the United States courts for the Indian Territory, and the clerks of the United States courts in Alaska to report and account for all moneys received by them on account of or as security for fees and costs, and to report and account for all amounts collected or received by them on behalf of the United States on account of judgments, fines, forfeitures, penalties, and costs. The Attorney-General shall also hereafter require such clerks to report and account for any other moneys received by them in their official capacity, whether on behalf of the United States or otherwise, and the Attorney-General shall hereafter prescribe such docket or dockets or other books as he may deem proper to be kept and used by such clerks in recording, reporting, and accounting for moneys mentioned above in this paragraph, and in recording all fees and emoluments earned by them, which dockets or other books shall be kept and used by said clerks in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Attorney-General.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York reserves the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman from Maryland will reserve the point of order in order that the committee will have an opportunity to explain the reasons for incorporating this proposition.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I reserve the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order now.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then the gentleman evidently does not wish to have any explanation of the reason for this legislation.

Mr. MUDD. I make the point of order that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland has made the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Maryland if he will not consent to make the point of order to the portion commencing "the Attorney-General will hereafter," etc., and not make the point of order to the whole section, so as to cover the appropriation.

Mr. MUDD. I make the point of order to the whole paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland makes the point of order on the entire paragraph.

Mr. MUDD. It is a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No; except that I wish the Chair would rule on just what is the paragraph. It is our contention that the portion I requested the gentleman to limit the point of order to is the whole paragraph—that is, that the paragraph is a separate paragraph, and that the point of order does not go to the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland has made the point of order to the entire paragraph.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The point that is sought to be made is that the Chair is requested to determine how much constitutes the paragraph. The contention of the committee is that the appropriating portion is a separate pafagraph, and that this is a further paragraph.

Mr. MUDD. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I think we will agree about that. I understand the contention of the gentleman from Iowa to be that a new paragraph begins with and including line 6.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is what I asked the gentleman to be specific about, and to make his point of order only to that portion.

Mr. MUDD. I am willing to let it be understood that it goes only to that.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is clearly subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order. The Chair is of the opinion that the entire paragraph is subject to the point of order, and that the paragraph is the paragraph, or, in other words, down to where it is indented, which ordinarily constitutes a paragraph in an appropriation bill and in an ordinary grammar. Now, a portion of it being obnoxious to the rule, the entire paragraph goes out if the point of order is made to the paragraph. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Where does the Chair hold the paragraph begins? That seems to be the real question.

The CHAIRMAN. It begins line 6, page 146, and continues to line 2, page 147.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Chairman, I offer as a substitute for the paragraph stricken out the paragraph which I have sent to the desk to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Masachusetts offers a new paragraph, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 147, at the end of line 2, add: "On and after October 1, 1906, no sums of money shall be payable under and by virtue of the act of Congress of June 4, 1897, providing for the revision and codification of the criminal and penal laws of the United States, and the subsequent acts of Congress of March 3, 1899, and March 3, 1901, enlarging the duties of the Commissioners appointed under said act, and the said Commission so created shall, on or before said October 1, 1906, complete the duties imposed upon them thereby, and shall present their final report thereon to the Attorney-General, in accordance with the provisions of said act, before said date, and shall turn over to the Attorney-General all papers, documents, and correspondence pertaining to the work of the Commission, and all furniture, books, etc., in their possession and employed by them in the prosecution of their duties under said appointment; and all acts and parts of acts relative to their duties, powers, and employment shall thereupon be repealed.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order. The purpose of the amendment is to abolish the Codification Commission. I had a talk with a member of that Commission this morning, and he told me the Commission would not be prepared to make its report earlier than the 15th of December. The amendment is clearly subject to the point of order, in my judgment, and if the gentleman from Massachusetts will change the date from October 1 to December 15 next, I will withdraw the point of order, but otherwise I will be compelled to insist upon it.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts who offered the amendment will permit me to make an explanation. I believe that there is ample justification for reaching an end of this Commission, but I think it ought to be done in the most satisfactory way possible to reach the end intended by its original organization. Now, between October 1, when Congress will not be in session, and the 15th of December, when Congress will be in session, is a matter of two and a half months of time, and so far as I am concerned I am perfectly willing to concede and waive any question of order if that date can be fixed. I was going to propose the 1st of January, but inasmuch as the gentleman from Indiana has stated the 15th of December, I am perfectly willing to accept that proposition——

Mr. PERKINS. I can not hear what the gentleman from Ohio is saying.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I was proposing simply this: The amendment as proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, which is the 1st of October, and I propose to make it the 15th of December, when Congress will be in session, and then I would provide for turning over all the material on hand, and I think it is fair to take the statement of the Commission itself which I have in my hand, that it will be unable to finish its work satisfactorily as early as the 1st of October, and on reflection it will be seen, I think, by any Member of Congress if we adjourn here not earlier than about the 1st of July, in the middle of the hot weather, we could not expect a great deal of work to be done.

Mr. BARTLETT. What date does he propose to substitute for October 1? I did not hear.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The date proposed by the amendment is the 1st of October.

Mr. BARTLETT. What date do you suggest?

Mr. GROSVENOR. And the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has suggested the 15th of December, with which I am content.

Mr. BARTLETT. So am I.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Well, agree to that.

Mr. HOAR. I am content to accept the date on behalf of the Committee of Revision of the Laws suggested by the gentleman, and while I do that I ought to state to the House, in justice to the Committee on Revision of the Laws, that the chairman of the Commission came before the Committee on Revision of the Laws and stated they could complete their work in sixty days from the 1st of July, which would bring the date to the 1st of September, and the Committee on Revision of the Laws went over very carefully the condition of the work of the Commission and was satisfied that their date which they then fixed was accurate. But the most important thing is to have the work of the Commission ended, and the expense connected with the Commission cease as a public charge on the Treasury. And therefore I am content, because I believe this legislation is of great moment and great importance to the country, to accept the date of the 15th of December.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like the gentleman who offered this amendment to state whether the index or any considerable part of it is complete.

Mr. HOAR. The chairman of the Commission asserts that an index is more than half completed, or can be easily completed by the Commission by the 15th day of December. If this is not true, the little work that will be necessary to complete the index can be done at an infinitely cheaper cost to the Government than to maintain three Commissioners each at a salary of $5,000 a year, each having their separate and private clerk, and also a general clerk of the Commission. The work, in my opinion, can be finished by the 1st day of October and the index practically completed, but I am content to accept the date that has been mentioned.

Mr. KEIFER. The revision can not be indexed until it is completed by Congress. There is force in what the gentleman from Massachusetts says about its having to be completed later on, but the Commission has been charged with the matter of preparing an index and has to a considerable extent performed that work, and it is engaged now, I understand, in trying to index its own work. But I beg to say, Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, this Commission, in its work of revision, has been undertaking to make laws and unmake them, and I am afraid some of the younger men here will be as gray as I am before Congress adopts this revision. It is the fault of the law that authorizes them to undertake to revise our statutes and the work of Congress. Many sections of existing law have been omitted and may important provisions have been added, according to the notion of one or more members of this Commission, and I do not believe that, considering the state that the revision is in, we are likely to do very much in the direction of adopting the revision of the Commission. I will be content if the amendment is so modified as to fix the termination of the Commission on the 15th of December next.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman from Ohio will allow me an interruption, I will say that I have had the same feeling that he has had about what seemed to me to be a usurpation on the part of this Commission in the matter of changing the existing statutes of the United States and introducing into the body of the statutes an absolutely new provision. Not very long ago there came to my knowledge—I do not care to speak of what it was—the fact that into one of the chapters there has been inserted a measure that afterwards made its appearance here in the House of Representatives and was overwhelmingly defeated by a vote of the House. I called the attention of the chairman of that Commission to that fact and to the other facts connected with this action of theirs, and he cited me the statute under which they were created; and while it seems to justify what they have done, I doubt very much whether they have not put a rather forced construction upon the statute itself. This is the statute under which they were appointed.

Amend the imperfections of the original text; and may propose and embody in such revision changes in the substance of existing law.

In order to justify some of the things which they have done, you must construe that language, "changes in the substance of existing law" so as to read, "to provide new substantive legislation." I am sure the Commission has put a very erroneous construction upon that provision, and if they have not, then the act in that regard is clearly unconstitutional. This Commission is not a Congress.

Clearly they had no such power. One word further. Coming to the particular section of the statute about which I complain, I learned to my utter amazement that it was drawn in the Attorney-General's Office and carried to the codifying Commission, and they were requested by the Attorney-General to put it into the statute.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I only wish to add that I think that when we are through with this Commission that we will want another codifying commission in order to codify their work and to revise it in conformity with existing law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I suggest that the gentleman from Massachusetts modify his amendment and I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the date be changed in the two places reading October 1 by substituting therefor December 15.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers a modification of the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 147, at the end of line 2, add: "On and after December 15, 1906, no sums of money shall be payable under and by virtue of the act of Congress of June 4, 1907, providing for the revision and codification of the criminal and penal laws of the United States and the subsequent acts of Congress of March 3, 1899, and March 3, 1901, enlarging the duties of the Commissioners appointed under said act, and the said Commission so created shall, on or before said December 15, 1906, complete the duties imposed upon them thereby, and shall present their final report thereon to the Attorney-General in accordance with the provisions of said act before said date, and shall turn over to the Attorney-General all papers, documents, and correspondence pertaining to the work of the Commission, and all furniture, books, etc., in their possession and employed by them in the prosecution of their duties under said appointment, and all acts and parts of acts relative to their duties, powers, and employment shall thereupon be repealed.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this amendment be now closed.

Mr. BARTLETT. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. It was impossible to hear what was said, and I want to know the status of the amendment. Something has been read. Is that a substitute for the former amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman, that after the paragraph went out on a point of order the gentleman from Massachusetts offered a new paragraph.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand that.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been had upon that; the point of order was reserved to the new paragraph by the gentleman from Indiana, and that has been withdrawn.

Mr. BARTLETT. What is the date fixed by the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The 15th day of December. [Cries of "Vote!"] The question is on the motion that debate be now closed.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the new paragraph, offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. LILLEY of Pennsylvania. Can the amendment be again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been reported three times, but if there be no objection it will be reported again.

Mr. TAWNEY. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter United States commissioners shall be entitled to charge for drawing complaint for search warrant, with oath and jurat to same, 50 cents; and for issuing search warrant, 75 cents.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that paragraph that it changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland makes the point of order against the paragraph just read.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, this provision was put into the bill upon the recommendation of the Attorney-General to put a stop to an abuse that exists to-day. If the gentleman from Maryland makes the point of order, it will have to go out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter a United States commissioner shall be allowed the fee for making a transcript only when he holds an examination as provided by section 1014, Revised Statutes of the United States, and no such fee shall be allowed for a transcript of proceedings under section 1042, Revised Statutes of the United States: Provided further, That hereafter the application of a poor convict for discharge under section 1042, Revised Statutes of the United States, shall be made to the United States commissioner nearest the place of confinement.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, during the general debate at the opening of the consideration of this bill the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] criticised the action of the Secretary of Agriculture, Hon. James Wilson, in connection with the buildings for which this proposed appropriation is to be made. I want to say at the outset that, in my judgment, the Secretary of Agriculture's construction of the statute under which he is constructing this building is an erroneous one. I do not believe that the statute authorizing the construction of a building for the Department of Agriculture authorized the construction of the two buildings now in course of construction.

But if I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts correctly, he not only charged that an erroneous construction had been put upon the statute, but charged that the Secretary of Agriculture had intentionally acted illegally. From that proposition I must dissent. The Secretary of Agriculture has been a citizen of Iowa for more than fifty years; and from the hour that he became a citizen of that State there has never been, so far as I know, a man between the Mississippi and the Missouri rivers who doubted his honesty of purpose or the integrity of his conduct. The Secretary of Agriculture came to his present office with a higher training than any man that ever filled that position. We have had able men fill the office of Secretary of Agriculture, but never had a man before who, through a long course of years, had received special training for that place. He had long been a member of the faculty of one of the largest and best agricultural colleges on the continent. He came to his present high office with extraordinary training and has filled it with extraordinary credit; and it is my judgment that in the last eight years there has been no more popular member of the Cabinet than sterling old James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture of the United States. [Loud applause.]

I regret that there is any doubt as to the buildings conforming to the true construction of the law authorizing them; but I have no doubt of the high purpose which led the Secretary of Agriculture to enter upon the construction of those buildings. I am prepared to go even further than that, and say that, in my judgment, the act we passed was a mistake, and that the buildings that are being erected will be, when completed, for the best. I do not think a building constructed strictly in accordance with the statute would have been adequate for the public needs. In any event, these buildings have had appropriated for them more than $900,000, and there is but one course for us to pursue, from a business standpoint, and that is to proceed to finish the buildings as they have been started on the present plan.

I was glad that the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts was at least generous enough to doubt whether the Secretary of Agriculture had intentionally and upon his own motion started the erection of these buildings in violation of law. I have no information upon that subject. I do not know whether he was encouraged to erect the buildings that he is now constructing by some one above him or not.

I do know that the law imposed upon him a responsibility, and that James Wilson is too courageous and too loyal to try and unload that responsibility upon any other human being, whoever he may be. [Applause.] Twenty-one years ago last spring U. S. Grant was writing his memoirs, at a time when his very life was being eaten away; but he was poor, and he was struggling on in the hope that the product of his literary labor might support his family when he was gone. At that time, when he was displaying more of heroism than he ever displayed upon any battlefield of the civil war, a bill was pending in the Congress of the United States to put him upon the retired list of the Army. While that bill was pending here for his retirement, there was also pending a contest for the purpose of unseating, as a member of this Chamber, this same James Wilson, of Iowa. Under the rules then in force a filibuster was going on to prevent his being unseated. At last, realizing that if that filibuster were continued to save him, the bill for the retirement of U. S. Grant could not pass in that Congress, which was then drawing to a close, James Wilson stood upon a desk in the rear of where I now stand and appealed to his Republican brethren to allow him to be sacrificed and cast out of this House that U. S. Grant might be placed upon the retired list, and thus hope and joy be carried to the patient sufferer at Mount Macgregor. [Applause.]

The same devotion to his friend, the same loyalty to his duty, the same willingness to sacrifice himself for others, has always characterized plain James Wilson, the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, who, whatever may have been his mistakes in this matter, has done his duty as he saw it, and has not tried to unload responsibility upon anybody else. [Applause.]

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think the matter has been fully discussed, and I do not want to add anything to what I said the other day, except this single comment, that the speech of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] amounts to this, that the Secretary has violated the law, but that his heart beats warmly for his country. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

To pay Robert Brent Mosher for use of his plates in printing, for the use of Congress, 1,500 copies of the Executive Register of the United States, 1789 to 1902, $1,000.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Only to state that it is new legislation and a claim, and I can not see that it has any proper place in this bill any more than other claims recommended for payment by the various Departments.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to be heard on the matter?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. As I understand it, this is not a claim; this is a proposition to appropriate money.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman will admit it is new legislation, and not warranted by law anywhere.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think there has been an authorization for the printing of the book in some form, and, as I understand it, the plates were borrowed in place of making new ones, and thus obtained at a less cost than they would have been obtained if we had made new ones.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Iowa inform the Chair whether there is any authorization in law for the payment of this item?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have just stated, Mr. Chairman, that as I understand it, the publication of the work was authorized. It had been compiled by this gentleman, and his plates were borrowed in place of making new ones. There is no further authorization than that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that if this item can go in any bill, it properly belongs on the deficiency bill under the law and not in this bill. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee on Department Methods: For actual traveling expenses, and for per diem not exceeding $4, in lieu of subsistence when absent from home and traveling on duty outside of the District of Columbia, of members of and persons employed by the Committee on Department Methods appointed by the President June 2, 1905, and for other necessary expenses of said committee, including not exceeding $5,000 for salaries or compensation of persons not otherwise employed by the United States, $25,000. No part of this appropriation shall be paid as additional salary or compensation to any person serving in connection with or for said committee who is at the same time employed in any capacity by the United States: Provided, That there shall be reimbursed out of this appropriation to the reclamation fund any sum that may be paid to persons in the reclamation service while they are on detail to and in the service of said committee.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on this whole paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order upon the paragraph.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I am not complaining at the work of the Keep Commission, but its work is the investigation of Department methods, and the Departments being all located in Washington City, I can not understand why we should provide for traveling expenses.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman makes the point of order. There is no use discussing the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee make the point of order or reserve it?

Mr. SIMS. I will reserve it for the purpose of hearing the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will explain to the gentleman that this appropriation has been allotted for traveling expenses, to defray the expenses of specialists or experts in and outside of the Departments to visit large manufacturing and industrial institutions for the purpose of studying their methods of bookkeeping and management, in order, if possible, to improve the governmental methods, or modernize them and make them conform as nearly as practicable to the methods employed to-day by the large institutions of the country.

Now, to send these men out for that purpose will require travel, and of course their traveling expenses must be provided for. In addition to that, there are men employed in the Reclamation Service whom the Commission will utilize, men who are out in the field for the purpose of studying the business methods in local land offices—other portions of the public service—and it is for the purpose of defraying the traveling expenses of all the men sent out for these purposes, and for the purpose of gaining information concerning the best methods employed in the larger industrial institutions in the United States.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.
Mr. BRUNDIDGE. This is an appropriation for the Keep committee. Is there any law authorizing the President to appoint the committee in the first place, and was not the appointment absolutely unwarranted and without any law enacted by Congress?
Mr. TAWNEY. No; the appointment of this Commission was not an illegal appointment.
Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Where is the law authorizing it?
Mr. TAWNEY. The people appointed on this Commission are the employees of the Government. They are in the service of the Government, and they are simply assigned to do this additional work.
Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Is it not the fact that some of them are not in the employ of the Government?
Mr. TAWNEY. No; only employees of the Government were appointed on the Keep Commission. The hearings disclosed that fact. The committee inquired very carefully into this matter.
Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. TAWNEY. I am using the time of the gentleman from Tennessee, not my own.
Mr. PADGETT. I want to ask if this is only a temporary appropriation?
Mr. TAWNEY. It is only an annual appropriation.
Mr. PADGETT. How many years is it contemplated to run it?
Mr. PERKINS. Nobody can say.
Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Until the committee cleans up the Augean stables.
Mr. PADGETT. I want to ask the chairman of the committee how long it is contemplated the Commission will be in force?
Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from Massachusetts has answered it so well I will not undertake to improve it. [Laughter.]
Mr. SIMS. I want to know if the gentleman thinks that the Departments are Augean stables? Mr. Chairman, I made the point of order, or reserved it, but I have no criticism to make on the Keep Commission. They may go on and do more good work. I never knew a commission that did not make a report that they had earned their salaries. But are our Departments in such a deplorable condition that we have got to appoint special men, experts, and then have got to send them——
Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I want to make one further statement. There is nobody on this Commission who is getting any salary in consideration of the service that he is rendering.
Mr. LITTLEFIELD. In excess of his regular salary, the gentleman means.
Mr. TAWNEY. In excess or beyond his regular salary. It is not because there is any corruption in the Departments that this investigation is being made. It is for the purpose of investigating the various methods employed in the Departments of the Government with a view to simplifying those methods, making them more efficient and simple and less expensive, and in doing that it is necessary for these men to go outside the city of Washington, because the governmental service is not confined to the District of Columbia. In order to guard against their receiving too much for traveling expenses we have limited the amount that can be expended for this purpose to $5,000.
Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I say that I am not complaining of the work of the Keep Commission. From what I know I think they have done some good work, of which I heartily approve. But I think that Congress ought to do this investigating, ascertaining these methods by a committee of this Congress either the committee that the gentleman has the honor to so ably preside over or a special committee. Here is appointed a commission of experts from the Treasury Department, and now we are going to provide $25,000 for these experts to travel over the country and inform themselves of methods of private institutions, that they may become educated at the Government's expense, as appears from the statements of the chairman of the committee reporting the bill, and inform Congress of what improvements can be made in the Department methods by reason of such junketing.
Mr. PERKINS. Doesn't the gentleman think that if we have experts that they ought to give valuable opinions without traveling over the country?
Mr. SIMS. The word "expert" implies that they are already able to give advice. To go junketing around over the country at public expense in order to investigate the methods of private institutions does not seem to me wise. A commission usually is at least half like Melchisedec, it has beginning of days, but usually has no end of years. [Laughter and applause.]
Mr. LITTLEFIELD. May I ask the gentleman a question?
Mr. SIMS. Certainly.
Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would like to ask the gentleman which he thinks is the most valuable way to obtain the information in this matter, to investigate the subject-matter or to theorize about it?
Mr. SIMS. I would have a practical investigation.
Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Exactly so. That is what this provides for.
Mr. SIMS. And I think Congress is able, through its committees, to make such a practical investigation as will enable it to adopt the best practical department methods.
Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If I get the scope of the subject we are discussing, that is what the bill provides for, a practical investigation and examination for the purpose of getting some information that is of value.
Mr. SIMS. By a commission.
Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I don't know what it is by.
Mr. SIMS. To be sent out to be educated.
Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, the gentleman certainly did not understand me that they were sent out to be educated.
Mr. SIMS. To investigate methods of private concerns. Isn't that educating them?
Mr. TAWNEY. It is not educating the men who are sent out.
Mr. SIMS. What is it for?
Mr. TAWNEY. It is for the purpose of ascertaining methods, with a view of adopting them and applying them to the administrative Departments of the Government. The gentleman can not claim it is the educating of the men who go out. How will you obtain information concerning the practical administration of a great industrial corporation unless you send some one there for it?
Mr. SIMS. What is education? It is only learning something that we do not know, and you are sending out a commission to learn that which they do not know in order that they may obtain information and give it to Congress or to the Departments.
Mr. TAWNEY. I presume there are 386 Members of this House who could be sent out for the same purpose, and the education that they would derive would be of value to the country.
Mr. SIMS. No doubt of it; but let Congress do it by a committee, because the life of a Congress ends every two years; but as for a commission, look at the discussion that we have had here this morning about our various commissions. They seem never to get through when they begin a job. We seem to admit by appointing this commission that the Departments are in a bad way and need investigation, and, without criticising anything they have done, I do not indorse making appropriations for traveling expenses when all the Departments are in Washington. I make the point of order and I insist upon it.
Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will reserve his point of order for a moment.
Mr. SIMS. I reserve the point of order for a few minutes.
Mr. PERKINS. Oh, make the point of order and get done with it.
Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman intends to make the point of order, let him make it now.
Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I trust the gentleman will withdraw his point of order, because I think, while his intention is good, he overestimates the ability of a committee of Congress to reach the abuses of the kind that are sought to be remedied by this commission. I have seen the manner in which Congress acts upon such matters, and I am not inspired with confidence in the results of investigations by Congressional committees. We had an experience this morning. The Committee on Appropriations sought to remedy abuses that are recognized to exist in the offices of clerks of courts of the United States. Large funds accumulate in their hands, and they are not required by law to make any accounting to the Attorney-General. There is no way by which the amount in their hands could be ascertained, and in order to remedy that defect in that system the committee inserted in its bill a provision requiring an accounting to the Attorney-General, whereupon an enterprising gentleman, a Member from Maryland, looking after his own clerk of his own court, made a point of order the result of which is to continue that abuse. I will say that I have no faith in committees of Congress dealing with abuses of this kind. I think the Administration was fully conscious of the extent of bad administration in the city of Washington and elsewhere when it first suggested this Keep Commission.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. Wherein is the necessity of the Keep Commission sending people all over the country to find out how different concerns keep their books? Why can not the Keep Commission, if competent, continue this work in Washington, as it has gone on and done? The objection made is not to the Keep Commission, but to sending a lot of people around the country to find out how books are kept by different corporations.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Oh, no.

Mr. PERKINS. That is where the expense comes in.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman is mistaken as to the intention of the Commission.

Mr. PERKINS. No; the intention of the appropriation.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The Keep Commission, as I understand it, is made up of men who are now in the Government employ. They understand the methods of their Departments. It is because of their expert knowledge of Government methods that they are of value. It is true that they are empowered to hire experts to assist them, in giving advice, and it is true they may send agents of the various Departments of the Government throughout the United States. It is not the primary purpose of the Commission to investigate the manner in which private corporations do their business, but only incidentally and in a very small degree. The main purpose of the work is to try to bring the administration of the Government's business up to the level of efficiency of the great corporations and business concerns of the United States. Now, when the Administration seeks to deal with an acknowledged abuse, an abuse which has grown up under a Republican Administration, it seems to me that Members upon this side of the House ought to welcome the suggestion and ought to encourage the reform. I am aware that there is no sanction of law for it, but if the point of order is withdrawn the sanction of law will be given it by the passage of this bill. I have no doubt that members of this Commission, who have already been investigating, have found that horrors have been accumulating upon horror's head in various Departments. It is to remedy a situation, which a Republican President acknowledges to be a bad one, that this Commission is sought to be established.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. SIMS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. The gentleman is proceeding upon the assumption that grave abuses exist, and the chairman of the committee denies the abuses, but simply wants to improve the methods.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I understand the denial of the chairman of the committee only went to the corruption which was suggested and not to the bad business methods of the administration.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Is it not a fact that up to date this Commission has accomplished extremely valuable results to the Government?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Yes; the committee is of the unanimous opinion it ought to be allowed to go on.

Mr. SIMS. My point of order does not abolish the Commission; it simply prevents an appropriation for traveling beyond Washington City. They can go ahead in their work. All the good that has been done has been done here in Washington City.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I beg the pardon of the gentleman; his amendment goes further than that. You simply leave the Keep Commission where they can not spend a dollar and prevent their further investigation. Is not that right?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. That is practically right.

Mr. SIMS. They have not spent anything so far in their valuable investigations.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. They did not need to.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I understand all their investigations have been conducted at Washington so far, and there was no requirement for travel.

Mr. SIMS. The good work has been done so far without any Congressional appropriation, except the salaries of the men, which are not increased by this amendment.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And a unanimous committee of Republicans and Democrats say in order to continue the usefulness and efficiency of this Commission this appropriation ought to be made, and the gentleman makes a point of order against it; otherwise the Commission would have to pay their traveling expenses out of their own pockets.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the assumption of the gentleman from Maine is they must travel in order to keep up the good work. They have not traveled heretofore, and they have done a great deal of good work, as I understand from the gentleman, and I am perfectly willing they shall keep up their good work without traveling; so I make and insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon the point of order?

Mr. SIMS. Yes, sir; to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the Chair correct in assuming that no law has been cited?

Mr. TAWNEY. No, Mr. Chairman, there is no statutory authority for the Commission. The Commission has been appointed by the President of the United States, but it is limited to employees of the Government, and therefore needed no special statutory authority. The President simply assigned to these employees of the Government the duty of investigating the departmental methods, with a view to improving those methods. This appropriation is for the purpose of employing experts outside of the Government service, for which there is no authority of law, I concede, but the employment of which is very essential in order to render the Commission efficient.

The CHAIRMAN. The merits of the proposition are all right, but the leading authority seems to be wanting.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is no authority.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. There is one matter that I want to refer to. The gentleman from Illinois this morning asked me in respect to the appropriation for the salaries of assistant United States district attorneys. I stated that the committee had reported and allowed the full amount estimated by the Department, which was $225,000. My attention has just been called to the fact that the Attorney-General sent a supplemental estimate to Congress, but in some way it escaped the attention of the committee in making up the bill; and I was incorrect, therefore, in saying that we had allowed the full amount estimated by the Department for this purpose. I now ask unanimous consent to return to that item for the purpose of offering an amendment and increasing the appropriation to the amount estimated by the Attorney-General.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] asks unanimous consent to return to a paragraph which has been passed.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. The paragraph is found on page 145.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that we gave the full amount included in the annual estimate. This simply illustrates the necessity of some law requiring the Departments to submit in the Book of Annual Estimates the estimates for the entire service for the next fiscal year. There is no excuse for their not doing so, but they don't. The Committee on Appropriations had in the neighborhood of 100 supplemental estimates for this sundry civil appropriation bill, aggregating about $32,000,000. These supplemental estimates kept coming in from the time we commenced the consideration of this bill until we had finally completed it. And the same is true of all other branches of the Government. Supplemental estimates are sent here. It is to be hoped that Congress will soon enact a law that will require all the estimates to be included in the Book of Estimates, except estimates that are necessary by reason of the enactment of laws during the session of Congress for which the annual estimates have been submitted.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amount be increased from $225,000 to $250,000, on page 145, lines 18 and 19.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 145, change the amount in lines 18 and 19 to $250,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC PRINTING AND BINDING.

For the public printing, for the public binding, and for paper for the public printing, including the cost of printing the debates and proceedings of Congress in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and for lithographing, mapping, and engraving for both Houses of Congress, the Supreme Court of the United States, and the supreme court of the District of Columbia, the Court of Claims, the Library of Congress, the Executive Office, and the Departments; for salaries, compensation, or wages of all necessary clerks and employees; for the purchase and installation of, and instruction in, cost, audit, and inventory systems; for rents, fuel, gas, electric current, gas and electric fixtures, and ice; for bicycles, horses, wagons, and harness, and the care, driving, and subsistence of the same, to be used only for official purposes, including the purchase, maintenance, and driving of horses and vehicles for official use of officers of the Government Printing Office when in writing ordered by the Public Printer; for freight, expressage, telegraph and telephone service; for furniture, typewriters, and carpets; for traveling expenses, stationery, postage, and advertising; for directories, technical books, and books of reference, not exceeding $500; for adding and numbering machines, time stamps, and other machines of similar character; for repairs; for other necessary contingent and miscellaneous items authorized by the Public Printer; and for all necessary materials needed in the prosecution of the work, $5,000,000; and from the said sum hereby appropriated printing and binding shall be done by the Public Printer to the amounts following, respectively, namely——

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has not yet finished the reading of the paragraph.

Mr. TAWNEY. He has finished the reading of the first paragraph, and I ask unanimous consent to substitute what I have sent to the Clerk's desk and ask to be read, for the whole of the paragraph on public printing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the paragraph.

Mr. TAWNEY. To dispense with the reading of the paragraph and ask that the matter sent to the desk be read, and that it be substituted for the other paragraph in respect to the printing.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] offers the following, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after line 9, on page 160, together with pages 161 and 162, and line 1, on page 163, and insert in lieu of the matter stricken out the following:

"For printing and binding for Congress, including the proceedings and debates, and for rents, $1,993,500. And printing and binding for Congress chargeable to this appropriation, when recommended to be done by the Committee on Printing of either House, shall be so recommended in a report containing an approximate estimate of the cost thereof, together with a statement from the Public Printer of estimated approximate cost of work previously ordered by Congress within the fiscal year for which this appropriation is made.

"For the supreme court of the District of Columbia, $1,500.

"For the Executive Office, $2,000.

"For the Interstate Commerce Commission, $58,000.

"For the Bureau of American Republics, $20,000."

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order, Mr. Chairman, and submit an inquiry to see whether the paragraph is subject to the point of order or not. I do not know that I will press the point of order, but I wish to ask the gentleman a question, if I may have the floor. You struck out that part of page 160, printing and binding for Congress. That is in the substitute.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Then you provide in the next paragraph that no more than one-half of the allotment of the sum appropriated shall be expended in the first two quarters of the fiscal year. Now, in this next fiscal year, Congress will be in session one month——

Mr. TAWNEY. That provision has been carried in the bill for the last twenty-four years, and is in now.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is in error in saying that it has been carried in the law for twenty-four years; but whether it has or not, I would like to know what is the object in making the appropriation sufficiently large, so that only one-half of it is going to be used? It is perfectly plain that, according to this, you can not use the whole appropriation. I simply ask for information.

Mr. TAWNEY. Why, the gentleman surely does not think that we restrict them to only one-half of the amount appropriated? We restrict them to an expenditure not exceeding one-half of the appropriation during the first half of that fiscal year, so as to prevent them going on and expending all the appropriation in the first half and then coming in at the beginning of the next Congress with a deficiency.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question in the time of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does this amendment make any change in the public printing law of 1895?

Mr. TAWNEY. It does not. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me, and if the committee will give their attention a moment——

Mr. BARTLETT. If the gentleman will yield a moment until I ask him another question, then the gentleman can answer both. Does this amendment or substitute you have offered contain the provisions that are on page 167 and page 168, which provided that all the printing for the Departments shall be printed in the Government Printing Office in place of the Departments where they are now doing the printing? If it does, I want to make the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. It does not. This is an appropriation to pay for the printing that is done for the Departments, whether it is done in the Departments or in the Government Printing Office.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to get some information.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, I have the floor; if you ask a question, I will try to answer it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs pardon of the gentleman. The Chair thought the gentleman was through, and had yielded the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would just as lief ask the questions in his time as not. Is the sum total for the Printing Office less or more than last year?

Mr. TAWNEY. A little more than a million dollars less.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does it say that all printing done by the Government in Washington shall be done in the Government Printing Office?

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from Missouri will see to it that no point of order is made against it and the provision carried in this bill is enacted into law, that is what will happen in thirty or sixty days after this bill is passed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. So far as I am concerned, there will be no point of order, because that is where it ought to be done. Now, another question. My recollection is that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations made a furious fight a year or so ago, and several other gentlemen, too, and I stood by consenting——

Mr. TAWNEY. I never made a furious fight in my life.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri (continuing). Shutting off these Departments from having private carriages to run about Washington. Was not that true?

Mr. TAWNEY. That is the law now.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did you not do that?

Mr. TAWNEY. That was the gentleman from Indiana. I would not take any credit that belongs to my friend from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me ask you this question, then. Has not this Government Printing Office had three station wagons made, and printed the name of the Department so low and in such a small type that nobody can readily distinguish it, for the purpose of using them as their private property to run around Washington and visit socially?

Mr. TAWNEY. I am not advised as to that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why are you not advised?

Mr. TAWNEY. Because the suggestion was never made. If it had been made, I am certain that the committee would have interrogated the Public Printer about it when before the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I make it now, so that you may get at it at some other time.

Mr. TAWNEY. All right, we will be very glad to do it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There has been a great deal of talk about reform in the Printing Office, and my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS] and my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS] and others have been engaged in that arduous occupation, and I want to ask you a question in reference to it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Before proceeding to ask a question relating generally to the Printing Office, I want to make a statement regarding these appropriations, or the allotment that has been made, so that Members may understand it. I have offered a substitute, and I want the committee to understand just what the effect of it is, and how we came to offer it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If you will let me ask you one question I will let you alone.

Is it not true, in this reform administration down there, that they have created these offices, new offices—a chief inspector, at $3,600 a year; two assistant inspectors, at $2,000 each; one female inspector, at a salary estimated at $900; one Office physician, $2,000; one assistant Office physician, at a salary estimated at $1,400; one statistician, at $2,000; two additional stenographers and typewriters, at $1,200 each; four additional assistant stenographers and typewriters, at $900 each; making an aggregate in expense in the Printing Office at $19,900 a year?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say, in reply to the gentleman, that men have been appointed to these positions by the Public Printer, and under the law during this current year he has $6,000,000 in a lump-sum appropriation, which is distributed in his discretion and according to his best judgment in the employment of mechanics and laborers and persons in any branch of the service requiring employment. I will say further that it is my belief that if these positions had been created before, and if the services that are performed by the men now occupying these positions had been performed years before, the expenditure in the Public Printing Office would have been much less than they have been. I want to add that at the end of this fiscal year the Public Printer will turn back into the Treasury of the United States, $1,000,000, 100 per cent more than has ever been turned back by any one of his predecessors.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, let me say just about one sentence. I have asked this question for information. I do not want to consume the time of the House. I congratulate the gentleman if his statement is true, and possibly it may be. I will ask the leave of the House to print this newspaper extract in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to print a newspaper extract in his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extract is as follows:

IF NOT SPY SYSTEM, WHAT?—SOME FIGURES AS TO THE COST OF THE SYSTEM—CONGRESS SHOULD INVESTIGATE PRINTING OFFICE AND SYSTEM—SYSTEM'S REPUTATION SULLIES MR. STILLINGS'S FAIR NAME.

There seems to be some diversity of opinion in the Government Printing Office relative to a feature of the new régime which has so generally been called "Stillings's spy system." Hundreds of the employees believe it is a spy system and do not hesitate to say so when they are where the alleged spies can not watch the movements of their lips. On the other hand, gentlemen who are of the personnel of that system, whatever it may be called, assert, with much earnestness and apparent candor, that it is not a spy system. If it be not a spy system, it is unfortunate for the good name of Mr. Stillings's administration that the contrary opinion should be held by so many who come in daily contact with the system and are therefore qualified to judge of its character.

But, in any event, it is a useless, extravagant, and incompetent system, and, as has before been remarked, if it is not a spy system, there are no legitimate duties for it to perform which foremen and assistant foremen are not now being paid to attend to.

There should be a Congressional investigation of the Government Printing Office. The investigation should go down to the bone. The investigators should have the help of men who know the Government Printing Office—men who would be able to detect every effort to throw dust in the eyes of the investigators. This new system should be most rigorously looked into. The Standard is able now to give its approximate extra cost. The figures are as follows:

Chief inspector	$3,600
Two assistant inspectors ($2,000 each)	4,000
One female inspector (salary estimated)	900
One office physician	2,000
One assistant to office physician (salary estimated)	1,400
One statistician	2,000
Two additional stenographers and typewriters ($1,200 each)	2,400
Four additional stenographers and typewriters ($900 each)	3,600
Total cost of the system	$19,900

Of course, if it be a spy system, the above total will not by any means represent its cost. To it would have to be added the time lost from legitimate duties by the scores of spies scattered in all parts of the office. These subordinates of the system would necessarily lose much time in spying on their fellow-workmen and making reports to their superiors. It is regrettable that Charles A. Stillings permitted his fair name to be sullied by anything so odious.—Washington Standard, May 20, 1906.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, with the consent of the committee I want to make just a brief statement with regard to the allotment of this appropriation. The committee reduced the aggregate a million dollars. Then when we came to allot the $5,000,000 appropriation we counseled with the Joint Committee on Printing of the House and Senate. Members of the committee know that this Congress adopted two joint resolutions which it was claimed would have the effect, and I believe is having the effect, of making very great reductions in the expenditures for printing. The Committee on Appropriations called to its assistance the Joint Committee on Printing, and this allotment is the result of the work of the Joint Committee on Printing, and has been made in accordance with the provisions of the two joint resolutions which the joint committee reported and the passage of which they secured at the beginning of this session. If there are any questions that gentlemen desire to ask concerning the allotment, I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS], who has charge of the matter, to answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] withdraw his point of order?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will in a moment. If the committee will indulge me just for a moment, I will say that this paragraph gives a very graphic illustration of the results of hysterical legislation, and sometimes of reform legislation. I notice that the paragraph omits something which has been in the current law for several years, forbidding the publication of illustrations, photographs, engravings, and so forth.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from Illinois knows that is the permanent law. Why should we carry it in the appropriation bill?

Mr. MANN. It is not in this paragraph. I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the point of order. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

And no more than an allotment of one-half of the sum hereby appropriated shall be expended in the first two quarters of the fiscal year, and no more than one-fourth thereof may be expended in either of the last two quarters of the fiscal year, except that, in addition thereto, in either of said last quarters, the unexpended balances of allotments for preceding quarters may be expended: Provided, That so much as may be necessary for printing and binding the Annual Report of the Secretary of Agriculture, as required by the act approved January 12, 1895, shall not be included in said allotment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out that proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 163, strike out all after the word "expended," in line 8, down to and including line 12.

Mr. MANN. What is the reason for that?

Mr. TAWNEY. Under the present law, or under the printing law which we have passed, this proviso is no longer necessary, because it is provided for in the general law, as I am informed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS], chairman of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MANN. Does it not cost a large sum of money to print these yearbooks?

Mr. TAWNEY. The printing of the annual report of the Secretary of Agriculture is now chargeable under existing law against the allotment for printing to the Agricultural Department.

Mr. MANN. This does not refer to the Yearbook?

Mr. TAWNEY. This is the Yearbook.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I want to say that this does include the printing of the Yearbook.

Mr. MANN. Does the printing of the Yearbook come in the first quarter or in the last quarter of the year?

Mr. BARTLETT. How can it come in the first quarter?

Mr. MANN. If it comes in the first quarter and this item is stricken out, you will not get the Yearbook.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. The printing of the Yearbook extends largely through the entire year. It is used in the Government Printing Office largely in what is known among printers as "time copy."

Mr. MANN. Of course the gentleman from Indiana knows better than I that the composition work of the Yearbook is a small item. The principal item is paper and binding. If it is to go in the first quarter of the year and they are restricted from the use of more than a proportionate sum in the first quarter and this is the main item of printing from the Department, you won't get your Yearbook.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I want to say to the gentleman that it will not interfere in any manner with the printing of the Yearbook.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Public Printer to comply with the provisions of the law granting thirty days' annual leave to the employees of the Government Printing Office, $325,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 163, line 17, after the word "necessary," insert the following: "That from and after the date of the passage of this act the employees of the Government Printing Office, whether employed on piecework or by the day, shall be allowed by the Public Printer leaves of absence with pay for thirty days in each fiscal year, exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that amendment, that it is a change of existing law. I will reserve the point if the gentleman will limit his time to five minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, this amendment applies only to employees in the Government Printing Office and, if adopted, will place these employees on the same footing as those of the Executive Departments.

In each of the Executive Departments of the Government employees are, by existing law, entitled to thirty days' leave of absence with pay, exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays. Why should a discrimination be made against the employees in the Government Printing Office? Why should they not have their thirty days' leave during the fiscal year with pay the same as employees in each and all of the Executive Departments? The employees of the Government Printing Office are probably the hardest-worked people in any department, bureau, or office in the service. During the sessions of Congress much of the work of the Printing Office is "rush work;" all of this work must be done on time. Why should not those Government employees be entitled to the same consideration as employees who are not compelled to do this "rush work" incident to a busy session of Congress?

The employees in the Government Printing Office receive no better pay, and in many instances far less, than many of the employees in the Executive Departments, and, as I have before stated, all the employees in the Executive Departments receive, under existing law, thirty days' annual leave with pay, exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays, while the employees in the Printing Office receive thirty days' leave with pay, inclusive of Sundays and legal holidays occurring during such leave.

Speaking for myself, will say I am always for the workingman. I have been one of them all my life, and I do not hesitate to say that all of them who are worthy should be placed on an equal footing.

The amendment seeks to obtain that meed of justice which is due to employees in the Government Printing Office, whether male or female, which is already accorded to employees of the Executive Departments of the Government. Can or should any representative of the people on this floor object to this? The only interest which I have in the matter is an earnest and honest desire to place on an equality with all other employees in the Government service those men and women in the Government Printing Office who are absolutely entitled to equal consideration.

I trust the gentleman (chairman of the Committee on Appropriations) will withdraw his point of order and permit the committee of the House to decide by their vote whether or not this amendment shall be adopted. The amendment does not necessarily carry an additional appropriation. The appropriation you provide for is based on the number of employees in the service at the time the estimates were made. Since then many of the employees have been discharged or laid off, and I am advised that soon after the adjournment of Congress five or six hundred more will be discharged or temporarily laid off.

I desire to urge in the strongest manner possible on the membership of this House the absolute merit and justness of this amendment and earnestly urge the support of every friend of labor and honest toil in the support of same.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the point of order, and the Chair sustains it.

The Clerk read as follows:

To continue the construction of the Isthmian Canal, to be expended under the direction of the President in accordance with an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, as follows.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, with the request that it be now read and be permitted to remain pending during the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of the sum herein appropriated shall be used for the construction of a canal of the so-called "sea-level type."

Mr. BARTLETT. To that amendment, Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent yesterday given to the gentleman from Ohio, he is now recognized for one hour.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the problems relating to an isthmian canal have caused discussions in Congress as long continued and as earnest as those pertaining to great questions of political or economic policy. Three principal questions have been discussed. The first question was whether the canal should be built by the Government or by private initiative. After the expenditure of vast sums of money and several conspicuous failures under private enterprises it was decided by the act of June 28, 1902, that the Government of the United States should undertake the task. The second question was where the canal should be located. Numerous routes had numerous advocates. The same act of June 28, 1902, known as the "Spooner Act," registered the conditional decision of Congress in favor of the Panama route. It was supposed that a third question had also been decided by that act—namely, the type of the canal—and it is generally accepted that a lock canal should be the one adopted and constructed by the Government.

But of late a great deal of controversy has arisen on this subject. There has been widespread agitation for a sea-level canal. I shall endeavor to point out that the act of 1902 committed us to a plan under which locks and an elevated level were to be employed, but before doing so I wish emphatically to dissent from the opinion that we can afford to postpone the removal of this question from the domain of controversy. It is not fair to the President and to the executive officers of the Government who have this great enterprise in charge to say to them with one breath, "Proceed with the canal with all the speed you may," and with another breath to say, "We have not yet made up our minds what kind of a canal you shall build." It is unjust to the subordinates who have gone to the Isthmus to give to the work the best years of their lives and their best efforts, to hamper and embarrass them by failing to decide this question.

I am informed that some are now contemplating leaving the Isthmus with the thought that this delay means either that the construction will be indefinitely delayed or that there is a strong element here which does not desire any canal at all. A little later I will point out some specific practical reasons why a conclusion should now be definitely made which will leave no indication of doubt, but, in the first instance, I wish to call attention to the Spooner Act of 1902. Under this act the decision between the Panama and the Nicaraguan routes was left to the President, with a direction that if certain conditions could be complied with, that at Panama was to be selected. He was authorized to acquire, at a cost not exceeding $40,000,000, the rights, property, etc., owned by the New Panama Canal Company, and also to acquire from the Republic of Colombia, upon such terms as he might deem reasonable, perpetual control of a strip of land not less than 6 miles in width from sea to ocean, with the right to construct and maintain a canal. This control should include the right to maintain and operate the Panama Railroad. He was also authorized to acquire jurisdiction over the strip and the ports at the end thereof, to make such police and sanitary rules and regulations as should be necessary to preserve order and preserve the public health thereon, and to establish such judicial tribunals as might be necessary to enforce such rules and regulations. If he could not comply with these provisions of the act, he was to obtain the necessary territory from Costa Rica and Nicaragua and proceed with the construction of the Nicaraguan Canal. He did obtain by treaty with the newly organized Government of Panama a strip 10 miles in width instead of 6, and made satisfactory arrangements for our continued possession for the purpose of constructing and operating the canal, also for policing and for sanitary purposes. He secured a satisfactory title to the property of the New Panama Canal Company on payment of $40,000,000, and after accomplishing this he was directed to proceed by the specific language of the statute, as follows:

The President shall then, through the Isthmian Canal Commission hereinafter authorized, cause to be excavated, constructed, and completed, utilizing to that end as far as practicable the work heretofore done by the New Panama Canal Company of France, and its predecessor company, a ship canal from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean.

By this paragraph he was expressly directed—not merely authorized—to undertake the construction of the canal.

Now follows a direction which may be regarded as a limitation upon his authority, or rather, as a specification of the kind of canal to be built:

Such canal shall be of sufficient capacity and depth as shall afford convenient passage for vessels of the largest tonnage and greatest draft now in use, and such as may be reasonably anticipated, and shall be supplied with all necessary locks and other appliances to meet the necessities of vessels passing through the same from ocean to ocean.

In section 5 an appropriation is made and authority is granted to make contracts and to incur obligations for further expenditure to an amount set forth in the act. The section reads as follows:

SEC. 5. That the sum of $10,000,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated toward the project herein contemplated, by either route so selected, and the President is hereby authorized to cause to be entered into such contract or contracts as may be deemed necessary for the proper excavation, construction, completion, and defense of said canal, harbors, and defenses, by the route finally determined upon under the provisions of this act. Appropriations therefor shall from time to time be hereafter made, not to exceed in the aggregate the additional sum of $135,000,000 should the Panama route be adopted, or $180,000,000 should the Nicaraguan route be adopted.

Thus he was directed to proceed with the canal with the specification that it should be of such capacity and depth as should afford convenient passage for—vessels of the largest tonnage and greatest draft now in use, and such as may be reasonably anticipated, and shall be supplied with all necessary locks and other appliances.

A broader authority has perhaps never been given to the Executive than by this act. The measure clearly indicated the desire of the people for a prompt and effective prosecution of the work. Of course it will be conceded that Congress has the right, by repeal or other action, to take away the authority granted and reverse the decision made at that time, except that contracts made or obligations incurred would be binding.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I will say that I would rather not be interrupted. My time, while an hour, is very short, considering the magnitude of the subject. However, if I make any statement which is not clear, I am not only willing to answer questions, but ask Members to interrupt me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the point. The gentleman has read the language of the Spooner Act, which is in substance that the President shall provide such locks as are necessary, and I understand the gentleman to be arguing that that necessarily means a lock canal. Is it not true that even in a sea-level canal there must be at least one lock, and probably more?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. There would be a lock, but not locks. The use of the word "locks" instead of "lock," while significant, might not be regarded as conclusive. I was about to say that the necessary implication from the whole act is that a lock-level canal was intended. In interpreting this statute we must consider acts for river and harbor appropriations and some other appropriations of the Government which Congress had been making for years, and of the phraseology and purport of which both Houses of Congress must have been well informed when this measure was passed. In river and harbor appropriations the direction of Congress is to the Secretary of War. An appropriation is made and the Secretary is authorized to contract for certain works, with the usual provision that the further cost shall not exceed a certain amount, the work to be paid for from time to time as appropriations may be thereafter made. The amount of appropriation and authorization is invariably based upon estimates before Congress. Sometimes the direction is to prosecute the work rather than to complete it. Under these acts the Secretary is authorized, and by necessary implication is directed, to proceed with these works, making contracts for their completion or prosecution. The amounts accruing under these contracts are appropriated for from time to time in sundry civil acts. The act is a specific direction, however, to proceed, and should the contracts be made and Congress fail to make appropriations in pursuance thereof the contractor could bring suit in the Court of Claims and recover the amount due him under the agreement made. Now, let us notice the amount of the authorization. It is $135,000,000. At that time both House and Senate had before them a report of the Isthmian Canal Commission created in 1899, stating that a lock canal at Panama would cost $135,000,000 and a sea-level canal would cost $240,000,000. This Commission estimated also the probable cost on the Nicaraguan route at $180,000,000 in case the President should proceed with the Nicaraguan Canal. I have given round numbers, but the figures were understood at the time. If it had been the intention of Congress that there should be a sea-level canal there would certainly have been mention of the two hundred and forty millions, the estimate before it for that type, or at least some language giving to the President authority to expend in excess of $135,000,000.

It is true that under the directions contained in the act the plan in the engineers' report which was before Congress in 1902 had to be changed. It was necessary that the depth should be greater. The proposed depth under their report was only 35 feet and the bottom width 150 feet. In order to afford passage which would be convenient for boats of the largest size, it was decided that a depth of 40 feet and a bottom width of 200 feet would be required. There was also a change in the size of the locks, but with greater information on the subject, by a saving in some places, it has been maintained that the canal on the lock-level plan can be completed for $139,705,000, to be expended after the beginning of our occupation, an amount only slightly in excess of the original estimate. This, of course, does not take into account the $10,000,000 that was paid to Panama and the $40,000,000 paid to the New Panama Canal Company or the expenses of sanitation and of government.

In discussing the comparative merits of a lock and a sea-level plan it is desirable to state some general facts and considerations. The length of the Panama route from deep water on the north side, or that of the Caribbean Sea, to deep water on the south, or that of the Pacific Ocean, is 49.15 miles. The maximum elevation on the axis or center of the proposed canal was, in its natural condition, 333 feet above sea level. This has been excavated to a considerable extent. A recent statement makes the present height 210 feet.

Four chief obstacles may be mentioned whatever type is to be adopted. The first may be said to be the magnitude of the work. It is the greatest engineering problem ever undertaken, and yet it presents, save in one or two particulars, nothing untried or exceptionally difficult. In comparison with the two other canals, which are without locks, it should be stated that the Suez is 104 miles in length, as against 49.15, and the Corinth is only 2 or 3 miles in length. In the Corinth Canal the maximum excavation is slightly in excess of 200 feet, in the Suez about 70 feet. The latter goes through what is practically a desert, though there are lakes on the way affording a wide channel for a part of the distance. The greater magnitude of the work at Panama is noticeable from the fact that the actual depth of the excavation to sea level is 333 feet. If the sea-level plan should be adopted, this would be increased 40 feet, the depth of the proposed channel, or to 373 feet. But it must also be stated that at the point of the canal where it crosses the maximum elevation the cross section of the ground to be excavated is in a curved shape and slopes rise to a higher elevation on both sides of the proposed route. The bottom width of the navigable channel would be 200 feet, in addition to which there should be on each side where the excavation is more than 100 feet a berme or shelf 50 feet in width just above the water level. The object of these bermes would be to afford access along the canal at places where there is deep excavation, and also to detain, in part at least, from going into the canal, any earth which might slip down from the slopes either during its construction or after its completion.

As regards the location of bermes and the height of the cut at which they would be used, these are matters of detail and might be changed. In order to provide side slopes it would be necessary that the width should be increased as the excavation approaches the level of the ground above, and in view of the greater elevation on both sides of the center of the proposed route there would be, with a sea-level canal, an approximate width of 1,100 feet at the top of the cut in one location and a height of 600 feet. At this point the excavation is in hard and soft rock. The maximum width at the top of a lock-level canal would be about 170 feet less, or 930 feet, and the maximum height 85 feet less. The figures which I have given are in accordance with the best estimates obtainable, though the nature of the rock and the necessary extent of the slopes may change them somewhat. As compared with these figures it should be stated that the greatest excavation in this country in a cut for a canal or railroad, of which I have been informed, is 250 feet, which is on a low-grade freight line of the Pennsylvania Railroad near to the Susquehanna River, and this excavation appears only on one side.

Another obstacle is that of sanitation. The average rainfall on the Caribbean side of the Isthmus is about 140 inches, about one-half that amount on the Pacific side, and over 90 inches in the interior. This maximum rainfall of 140 inches is four times as much as the average along the Atlantic coast. In addition, there is the extreme moisture incident to so large a rainfall and constant tropical heat, though the temperature does not, save in the lowest portions, reach an exceptional figure. Sanitary conditions were inferior when our Government took possession on the Isthmus. The ports at the two ends were subject to epidemics of yellow fever and other dangerous diseases. None of these presents any insurmountable obstacle, although the work will be seriously handicapped by the severe climate and the interruptions arising from very frequent rains.

A third obstacle is the circuitous route which must necessarily be adopted. Generally speaking, four ridges extend along the Isthmus, though very much interrupted and not continuous. They are located, one near to the seacoast on each side, and two in the high portions of the interior. It would be impossible to construct a canal without taking into account these ridges. The route of the canal must be adjusted to the course of the streams. The proposed route crosses the Chagres River, of which mention will be made, at least eight times. The next and greatest obstacle, both to the construction and operation of the canal, is the Chagres River, the "terrible Chagres," as it has been called. Why is it called the "terrible Chagres?" Because of its extreme fluctuations and sudden rises. In the low-water stage it has shown a discharge at Gamboa which, during the period of recorded observations extending over nearly thirty years, has been as small as 383 cubic feet per second. At its maximum high-water stage it has been 76,000 cubic feet per second. The magnitude of this torrent may be understood when it appears that its maximum discharge is more than one-third as great as the total average flow from the Great Lakes going over Niagara Falls. It reached, in 1890, 65,000 cubic feet per second. It will be observed that the variation in the flow has been, if you compare the minimum and maximum, as 1 to 200. It rises in the very high ground east of the proposed route, and in the lower portion has friable banks. It is necessary that a considerable part of a sea-level canal should be constructed near to its course because its route must be adjusted to the ridges extending along the Isthmus, of which I have spoken. This ungovernable river has baffled the plans of many engineers and destroyed the most sanguine hopes.

Now, with the consent of the House, I will approach the maps and explain the situation more completely, endeavoring to show the distinctive features of the two types or plans of the proposed canal. For 7.15 miles from the Atlantic side to Gatun, partly in a bay and partly through ground easily excavated, their course would be substantially the same. At this point in the lock plan the level of the canal would be raised 85 feet by three locks, each of a lift of 28⅓ feet. These locks are successive, or in flight, and would be built in duplicate, or side by side. There would be six locks in all, each 900 feet in length and 95 feet in width. The canal would be carried upon this level for 32 miles to a place known as "Pedro Miguel," on the side sloping to the Pacific, where, according to the plan of the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers appointed by the President, a lock would be constructed in duplicate to a lower level, about 30 feet. From thence, through an artificial lake, the channel would lead to Sosa, a distance of about 5½ miles, where two locks would be constructed, again in duplicate, which would lower the level to that of the mean or average tide of the Pacific Ocean. From thence to deep water in Panama Bay would be 4.23 miles. This project of the Consulting Engineers, however, is likely to be modified so that the three locks on the Pacific side will be located at Pedro Miguel and below at Miraflores, having the same lift as suggested in the plan of the minority of the Board.

The sea-level plan contemplates a lock on the Pacific side to guard against the tide, which has a range of 20 to 23 feet, while on the Atlantic side it does not exceed 2 feet.

An essential feature of both types of canal would be the construction of great dams. The lock level would have a large dam in connection with the three locks at Gatun, which would create a lake 30 miles in length, in which would be impounded the waters of the river Chagres and its tributaries, as shown upon the map here representing the proposed lock canal.[a] Through 23 of these 30 miles the channel of the canal would lie. On the Pacific side, also, three dams would be constructed, impounding in a similar manner the waters which flow to the Pacific Ocean, again affording a deep and wide channel on the Pacific side. These latter dams would not be constructed if the modification suggested should be made.

The sea-level plan contemplates the construction of a dam at Gamboa here [indicating on the map], impounding the waters of the Chagres, which flow down from the higher ground above; also numerous other smaller dams to prevent, or check, the waters of impounded streams from flowing into the canal.

On the large map here are two lines, or routes, showing the approximate width of the proposed canals.[b] The upper one begins here on the Atlantic side, or in deep water on the Caribbean Sea, and represents the lock-level canal. The lower represents the sea-level canal along the same general route. For 4½ miles the course is nearly from north to south from Limon Bay, near to Colon, to the mouth of the Mindi River. If you will follow the map, you will observe an important, and I may say vital, difference between the two proposed canals, and when this is understood you have the very strongest argument for the lock canal. I think the feeling of every one of us would be that if it were practicable within reasonable limits of expense to build a sea-level canal, if the banks would not cave, if it could be readily maintained, if large boats could be readily steered and could go through without grounding or running against rocks at the side, a sea-level canal would be the enterprise which we would prefer.

But such a canal convenient for modern shipping and for prospective shipping would, in the judgment of those who have most carefully studied the subject, cost the sum of $400,000,000 and more, and would exhaust twenty years and more in building. It is proposed that the sea-level canal should be 500 feet wide for the first 4½ miles. The channel would be obtained for this distance by dredging in a bay or in low land next to a bay. From that point for 40 miles—I want to call attention to an apparent misapprehension. These routes represented here [indicating] are not one above the other or differently located. They are each on practically the same line, placed in juxtaposition on the map here. The sea-level canal, I repeat, for 40 miles would in earth excavation be 150 feet wide, in rock excavation 200 feet wide. To give exact figures, 150 feet wide for 20.39 miles, 200 feet for 19.47 miles. So for nearly 40 miles there would be an average width of almost exactly 175 feet. A lock-level canal contemplates the same plan for the first 4½ miles, and then a width of 500 feet to the proposed Gatun locks.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, the very able and instructive speech of the gentleman from Ohio is quite as interesting to Members of the House over here as to those who are immediately surrounding that gentleman, and I raise the point of order.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I think if gentlemen will be seated I can make this plain, so everyone can understand.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Inasmuch as the interruption has taken place, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio to state how much distance there is between the direction of the sea-level canal and the lock-level canal.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. They are virtually along the same line; there are variants, but those are not important. That involves so much detail I think it hardly worth while to go into it. At the Gatun locks, as I have stated, it is proposed to have in succession or flight three locks, having an aggregate lift of 85 feet to the highest level. Beside these locks at Gatun there is to be located across the channel of the Chagres, and impounding its waters, a dam 7,700 feet long. It is to be 135 feet high at the highest point, with a width or thickness at the bottom of half a mile, tapering to 100 feet at the top. Calculations have been carefully made to the effect that the water will rise for 85 feet of the 135 feet height of the dam, at which point the thickness of the dam will be 374 feet. In the central portion of this proposed dam there is a natural elevation through which a spillway would be constructed to take care of the waters while the canal is under construction, and to discharge the surplus after it is completed. In this connection it may be said that one of the greatest difficulties under either type will be the disposition of the waters while the canal is building.

There can be no question of the strength or permanence of this dam. There are some other questions relating to it which, if I have time, I will take up later. I think, however, all are solved with absolute certainty. This dam would raise the level of the Chagres and its tributary streams which flow on this side of the Isthmus to a level of 85 feet above the sea. It would create an artificial lake of an area of 118 square miles, 30 miles in length, through 23 miles of which the channel of the canal would lie.

Now, what are the differences between the two plans by reason of the creation of this artificial lake? At the beginning of the channel above the dam at Gatun in the lock canal, instead of a channel 150 feet wide and 40 feet deep, as proposed in the sea-level canal, there would be a channel 1,000 feet or more wide and 75 to 80 feet deep, and that very materially greater width and a materially greater depth on the higher lock level would continue for 23 miles. I just want, gentlemen of the committee, to put two figures over against each other. For 40 miles of the route, under the plans of the majority and minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers, the average width of the sea-level canal would be 175 feet, the average width of the lock-level canal would be 600 feet.[a] This difference would thus be in evidence for more than four-fifths of the length of the canal. Under the modified plan the difference in width and depth would be even greater for half the total length of the route. This difference alone, if other factors promised equal advantage, should turn the scale in favor of the lock-level plan.

Mr. MARTIN. I notice that you use the term "lock-level canal." Is lock-level canal a new proposition in engineering?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. By no means.

Mr. MARTIN. What is the distinction between that and the ordinary lock canal?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I used the terms indiscriminately. Either is correct, I take it; though perhaps the term "lock canal" is better.

Here are two maps showing, respectively, the proposed plans for the lock and sea-level canal. You will notice how frequently its route crosses the Chagres River [indicating Plates I and II].

Mr. OLMSTED. The route of which canal?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Either route; but the Chagres is prevented from crossing the lock canal.

What is the proposed disposition of the waters of the Chagres under the sea-level plan? They propose to build a dam here at Gamboa. It would be 180 feet high, rising from sea level, 50 feet to the bottom of the bed of the river, and thence 130 feet to the crest. Against this the waters would rise to a height of 170 feet, or 10 feet below the crest. The plan for a dam there is no doubt a feasible one, as well as that at Gatun. Each would be provided with spillways. There would have to be a considerable number of other dams as part of the sea-level plan. Of these, I must say that the foundations for them, and the practicability of their construction, does not seem, by any means, to have been as carefully studied as that at Gatun.

Mr. WANGER. In the estimate of flowage which you stated, as I understand, you referred to the cubic feet per second.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. WANGER. Past Gamboa?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. That is the estimate, and I will come to that.

Mr. WANGER. And farther down the stream——

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Farther down the stream it is estimated that the flowage would be half as much more. The 65,000 and the 76,000 which I have mentioned as a maximum would be impounded here [indicating site of Gamboa dam on the map]. There would be a spillway over which the maximum discharge would be 15,000 cubic feet per second.

Now, let us study the contour of this canal and the bed of the river near to it. The course of the proposed sea-level canal for the whole distance from Gambon or Obispo here down to Gatun, 22 miles, is near to the Chagres and lower than the bed of the river. Many of you have seen canals built by the side of rivers, and I do not believe one of you will recall a place where the level of the canal was not above the river beside which it was constructed, because no other plan would be regarded as safe. That is not all. In case a dam should be constructed at Gamboa, the comparative number of cubic feet at Bohio, down here 10 miles below, originating below the dam, still on the route of the Chagres, would be one-half the amount which would be impounded at Gamboa—that is, if there are 76,000 cubic feet per second, the maximum discharge in recorded freshets, which would be gathered by the Chagres at this point [indicating Gamboa dam], another 38,000 would empty into the river through tributary streams below this dam at Gamboa, all of which would be near to and a menace to a sea-level canal. There are seventeen of these tributary streams flowing into the Chagres the waters of which, directly or indirectly, might find their way to the canal below this dam at Gamboa, falling 30 to 150 feet to reach it. It is proposed to take care of the waters of these streams by dams on the principal tributaries, by diverting canals, and, in a large degree, by allowing this water to spill over into the sea-level canal. Now, what would be the result? If it were a broad stream, 400 or 600 feet wide, the canal could perhaps take care of a large volume of water; but what is the first thing that would happen? With the falling in of some tens of thousands of cubic feet of water per second at a time of freshet a very large amount of silt would be carried into that canal, and there must be constant dredging, with serious danger that at times the channel would be seriously impaired. What would be another result? Some of you have seen a very good illustration just below Niagara Falls, where 8,600 cubic feet of water comes through a tunnel into Niagara River a short distance below the falls. There is a resulting cross current reaching almost across the river, and that, too, although it is but a short distance below the great cataract. In the amount which might enter the canal would be included not only the 15,000 feet from the spillway at Gamboa, but the still larger quantity—very materially larger, probably—which in time of freshet would flow in from the lower Chagres and its tributaries. This would not only deposit a great quantity of silt in the canal, but would raise the current concededly to 2.64 miles per hour at the time of maximum flowage.

Now, suppose you have a vessel 600 or 700 feet long. The bill provides that provision shall be made for the largest vessels now in use or those that may be reasonably anticipated. A boat has been launched nearly 800 feet long. In a channel 150 feet wide, with a current of 2.64 miles per hour, it would certainly be difficult if not impossible to steer her. In some portions of this route at the side there is not only dirt, but rocks. But it is said the Suez is even narrower. I wish to say that there can be no comparison between the two. In the Suez Canal the difficulties of construction, in the first place, are not so great. In the second place, it is through a sandy desert, at no place having an elevation of more than 70 feet through which they had to excavate. If a boat runs its nose against the side, it is against soft sand, and no serious injury can be done. As against a rainfall of more than 100 inches per year on the Isthmus of Panama, that on the Suez at the Red Sea is 1 inch, increasing to 3 inches at the northerly end. Yet, further, the Suez Canal does not afford a waterway for boats of nearly so large a size as is intended at Panama. Again, the curvature in the sea-level Panama Canal would be greater than in the whole of the Suez Canal. Although the Suez is 104 miles in length, there are only 15 curves, with a total curvature of 467½°, as against 19 curves at Panama, with a total of 597° in 49.15 miles. The total curvature, as I recall it, is 13 per cent of the route in the Suez and 38.8 per cent at Panama; indeed, in the portion excavated in the land 47 per cent. In other words, taking the whole canal, there is nearly three times as much curvature, relative to the distance, in the Panama Canal as there is in the Suez Canal, and in that part outside of bays more than three and one-half times as much. This is for the most part eliminated by the lakes under the lock plan.

I now wish to make a comparison here with other channels as regards some of the alleged disadvantages of the two types. Let us consider the objections to the proposed locks, and the dangers to shipping arising from the use of locks, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, from narrow channels with swift currents. It is said that locks of such magnitude are not safe. They would be 900 feet long and 95 feet wide. They are not in advance of existing locks in length or width, but are in advance in depth. But there has not been an occasion to build locks of a larger size, and so the trial has not been made. The increase in size is not greater than has been successfully accomplished in almost every species of construction. The last thirty years has witnessed a development in sky scrapers. Thirty years ago there were no sky scrapers in Chicago or New York, but now a building more than twenty stories high is regarded as quite as safe as was one of six stories of that time. Thirty years ago, in a proposed plan for building a bridge 2,200 feet long and 150 feet above the water level, on the Detroit River, it was decided by engineers to be necessary to put in two piers. Later they said that such an important advance had been made that one pier would be sufficient, and still later it was unanimously agreed that if expense should be disregarded a bridge 2,200 feet long and 150 feet above the water could be constructed without any pier, giving absolutely a clear passageway under the bridge. These are illustrations of improvements in construction.

The masonry of the locks would be 40 to 45 feet in thickness, of great stability; the upper locks would no doubt be provided with double gates and, if necessary, above the lock there would be located a movable dam, to be raised in case of accident. In the fifty years during which the "Soo" locks, in St. Marys River, between Lakes Superior and Huron, have been operated, those who are opposed to a lock canal say that three accidents have occurred. These are all they can enumerate in fifty years, during which time a traffic of 400,000,000 tons has passed through, 44,000,000 tons passing through last year without a minute of interruption and without any accident. When the accidents occurred the repairs to the gates and to the boats were easily made.

But where have the accidents happened? In channels 300 feet wide or more, below the locks in St. Marys River, where the current is not 2.64 miles, but 1½ miles per hour, and at the St. Clair Flats Canal, where the current is 1¼ miles. In these channels, more than twice as wide as the prevailing width in the proposed sea-level canal, with maximum currents half the maximum there, there have been during the fifty years mentioned a long list of disasters arising from collisions, from grounding, and, perhaps worst of all, as the result of boats being driven athwart the channel. By these accidents shipping has been delayed many days, with the result that the damage to traffic upon the Great Lakes has assumed very large proportions. If these boats, which until recently averaged less than 400 feet in length, would meet with such accidents in channels of greater width and in currents not so swift, what would be the probabilities in a canal where the specifications require provision for boats 800 feet long and of very much larger size? Thus, when we take into account the danger that may arise from locks they are far outweighed by the danger arising from the narrowness of the proposed sea-level channel and the current that might be created in it. These velocities of 1½ miles per hour in St. Marys River between Lakes Superior and Huron and 1¼ miles per hour in the St. Clair Flats Canal have been recently furnished by General Mackenzie, Chief of Engineers, and are official figures.

It has been said that this maximum current would only occur occasionally. In answer to that: In the first place, any waterway should provide for navigation every day in the year, and should be built in accordance with the extreme demands upon it. In the next place, with so great a rainfall, strong currents, if not reaching a maximum of 2.64 miles per hour, would be frequent and cause very great difficulty and danger.

I have no question about the stability of these locks, their permanency, or their sufficiency. Of course, there might be damage to them by great earthquakes, and if I have time I will come to that later.

Objection is also made to the Gatun dam here, the dimensions of which I have already given. The safest of dams, I take it, is an earthen dam of very large dimensions, which in this case would be one-half mile wide for the bottom width and of such a heighth and massive dimensions that it would be impossible to wash it away. Is there any danger of percolation under it, any danger of its being washed away by a fissure or anything of that kind? Certainly not. The danger of percolation has been thoroughly examined, borings have been made everywhere in the neighborhood, and it has been found that the seepage or percolation would be insignificant, negligible, as the report states. Even if there were some degree of seepage, by the use of cement grouting, or by the putting down of steel plates, this could be absolutely shut off.

Now, as regards the advantages of width, of safety, of the absence of current, every argument is for the lock-level canal. There are a great many who have the idea that on the upper level the channel is just as narrow as on the lower level, and the moment that you tell them that there is an average of 600 feet on the upper level and 175 feet on the lower level, it destroys the force of the arguments which have influenced them and creates an absolutely different impression of the comparative merits of the two. It is now time that I should call attention briefly to some practical reasons why this question should be put entirely beyond peradventure.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Why, certainly.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. There is one question I would like very much to have the benefit of the gentleman's information and judgment upon. We are going to build this canal not for the present generation, but for generations to come and for the centuries to come. Now, assuming that we construct a lock canal, will the same character of ships, the size of ships, pass through that canal as is contemplated to pass through a sea-level canal, and what would be the difference as to time?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. As regards time, in case of a large traffic boats could pass through the lock-level canal more quickly than by a sea-level canal. Why? Because in these portions here there is a greater width, boats would have ample opportunity to pass each other and need not slow down at points where they might meet. With a sea-level canal, I will say, generally speaking, that a small boat could go through more promptly. It would not be compelled to slacken speed so much as a large boat because of curves and narrow channels. But a large boat could go through the lock-level canal more promptly. The passage would depend very largely on the time required for going through six locks as against one lock by the sea-level plan. It will be conceded by everyone that, apart from the lock portion of the canal, progress can be very much more rapid in the lock-level canal than in the sea-level canal, especially with a boat of large size, because of the necessity of checking speed in the latter, the danger of collision and of running against the banks, and especially because of the danger that a large ship might be lodged across the channel. Further answering the gentleman, I do not anticipate that there would be any possible need for a larger canal than that under the lock plan for fifty years to come. Of course, that is a matter of conjecture. It would provide for boats with 40 feet draft and 90 feet beam. I say 40 feet—that is, 38 feet, practically. It would allow for a length of 780 feet to 800 feet or more. The very largest boats that have gone through the Suez Canal since January 1, 1905, and, I take it, the largest at any time since its opening, was one which had a draft of 26 feet 3 inches and a length of 560 feet; another having the greatest width was the English war ship the Terrible, having a beam of 78 feet. In making our plans it is well to provide for the centuries to come, but it is also well to provide that we do not reach the next century before we finish the canal. [Applause.]

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. The gentleman from Ohio mentioned one lock or a series of locks with an aggregate lift of 85 feet. I merely want to ask if there would be other locks and what would be the aggregate lift?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Eighty-five feet up and 85 feet down, three locks on the Atlantic slope—that is, on the Caribbean Sea side—and three on the Pacific slope.

Mr. OLMSTED. In the Rideau Canal in Canada, which is 120 miles long, of course not so wide as this nor so deep, there is an aggregate lift of over 300 feet.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. That is true. Of course it should be stated in candor that no such sized boats as are contemplated here go through the Rideau Canal.

Mr. OLMSTED. They carry boats of over 100 feet in length.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. They carry boats of very considerable size, but this is to be built for not only the very largest-sized boats, but with provisions for safety.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct the attention of the gentleman to one fact that seems to have escaped his attention, and that is, I think, he stated there were 23 miles of lake navigation of lock-level canal and there is a depth of 75 feet.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I think I so stated, gradually diminishing to 40 feet, the channel beginning at a width of 1,000 feet.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. The point was this, that the steamers coming through that lake navigation could go at a very much higher speed than they could through the canal.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. On account of the wash on the banks they are obliged to maintain a slow speed.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. Through that lake they would probably go at full speed.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Yes; they might; but probably they would not try to attain their maximum capacity for speed. In a short distance they would not go under full headway.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. That would more than abrogate the time consumed in locking.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. It would with a large ship certainly. I think a smaller ship could go through more quickly on a sea-level canal.

Something was said not long ago to the effect that this wide lake would not be a good thing, notwithstanding there is in places a thousand feet of channel, because it gradually becomes very shallow at the edges, and it is said that the sea-level canal would have an advantage, because the pilots would see the trees on the sides. I do not take that seriously. A pilot does not depend on trees, but on his knowledge of the channel, and this channel, 1,000 feet wide for 16 miles and 800 feet for 4 miles more, outside of shallow water would be buoyed, and every navigator has to keep track of buoys. If he can not, he does not know his business.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman gave us the statistics of the number of accidents that happened in the last fifty years in the Soo Canal. I would ask the gentleman if he has the statistics as to the accidents that have happened in the Manchester Canal?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. There may have been more there, but that is a very simple proposition.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Then I wanted to ask the gentleman in that connection what would happen to a lock-level canal such as the gentleman has described if an accident should occur so that the ship would go down through—would carry the gates?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. In the first place, it is an impossibility, if the locks and approaches are properly constructed and properly managed. It is beyond belief. It would be necessary, of course, that there should be approach walls above and below the locks. The Manchester Canal does not have these of a kind that would be constructed here and which common prudence would require should be constructed. Then there would be double gates and, as I said, a movable dam above the upper lock which could be put up in case of damage. All the dangers that have been exploited by the opponents of the lock canal have been met and solved at the Soo, every one of them. They have gotten along there for these fifty years without difficulty.

I was about to speak of reasons of a practical nature why this matter should be settled beyond question. I desire now to have the profile maps brought here. There is an idea that we can go along in a lucky-go-easy way and the work will apply alike to a sea-level or to a lock canal. Let us examine some reasons why such is not the case. Here are the profiles and plans for the canal.[a] I will say that this profile of the sea-level canal is erroneous in one important particular. At the northerly end it represents the old line selected by the French company, upon which there has already been a good deal of excavation, but this line has been abandoned, so that from that point [illustrating on the map] the ground is not yet below sea level. Now, the three great problems in a lock canal, as far as construction is concerned, would be the building of this dam at Gatun here, the building of the locks at Gatun, and the cutting down of the Emperador-Culebra Heights here. The question is, which will require the longest time? In my judgment, the construction of the three locks at Gatun will take the longest time, and work should be commenced upon them at once. If a lock canal should be constructed, what should be done? This channel could be dredged here 7.15 miles to the proposed location of the locks, so that material might be brought there by a direct channel from the sea. Thus cement could be brought from Gulf ports or from other seaports, and the same opportunity would be available to obtain other necessary materials—lime, gravel, sand, crushed rock, etc. Now, if it is to be a sea-level canal the natural plan for making excavations would be to use your railroad so as to work along up here upon this upper level without turning your force in the direction mentioned. The method of constructing the dam at Gatun affords another reason for an early decision. The dredged material from the canal below Gatun should be utilized. Earth dredged from water would afford a better material than dry earth brought from other sources, and it could be conveyed to the dam by pipes connecting directly with the dredges near at hand or with scows bringing the dredged material from more remote points.

But there are two or three other points which are much more important than either of these. Here is your summit of 333 feet rising like the sides of a cup on both sides. If it is a lock canal, the excavation at the top would naturally be at least 170 feet narrower than for a sea-level canal. What is the rational and economical way in which to proceed with that excavation? It is to begin at the outer edge on both sides. It would be necessary to locate steam shovels and equipment for removal of earth on the upper edges of the cross section of the canal. In excavating this cut it is intended that the sides have a slope with frequent shelves or benches, perhaps every 30 feet. It will be necessary to locate numerous steam shovels and railway tracks. The general slope of the sides, it has been estimated, would be what is called "1 on 1"—that is, for a height of 85 feet there would be an additional width of 85 feet. It will readily be recognized that if you have a sea-level canal, you begin 85 feet farther out on either side. If you proceed as if for a sea-level canal and then decide upon a lock canal, an enormous amount of unnecessary excavation would have been done. If you begin as for a lock canal and then decide upon a sea-level plan, it will be necessary to change the whole arrangement of the slopes at the sides. The expense will be especially increased by the change in the adjustment of the railway tracks and of the machinery. It is to be noticed that the estimate of the total excavation for a sea-level plan is 110,000,000 cubic yards at this cut; for a lock plan only 53,700,000 cubic yards.

There is another reason not quite so important, but a very substantial one. You must take care to exclude the torrential streams from the cut even on its highest levels. It is necessary while construction is in progress to dig ditches on both sides of the proposed excavation to divert the waters of these streams. These ditches will have to be dug through jungles with a great deal of difficulty. Now, if you are going to have a width of 1,100 feet they would have to be outside of 1,100 feet; if a width of 930 feet, you can locate them so much nearer to the center line of the canal and construct them with a great deal less difficulty.

The third reason arises from the method of disposition of the excavated material. In the dredging on the higher levels the removal of the spoil is the all-important consideration. Digging can proceed much more rapidly than removal. The question is, Where shall this earth after it is excavated be deposited? If a sea-level canal should be constructed it would be dangerous to locate it in the valleys below the heights, because numerous streams crossing the banks of the deposited earth at right angles would force great quantities of earth toward and into the canal. If, instead, under the lock plan a great lake should be created, this spoil could be placed upon the outer edges of the lake in comparatively quiet waters in which it would settle and be taken care of. At any rate, what would be the case if any one of you were to undertake an enterprise where this all-important question was undecided? You could not prosecute it with the same vigor and vim, with the same certainty in your calculations. And so I appeal to this House, by its vote, at least, to register its opinion in what way that canal is to be constructed, so that there may be no longer any doubt or hesitancy about it. It seems to me it is hardly worthy of us as a people, that, undertaking an enterprise of this nature, after we have waited so long we should still further postpone a conclusive decision. I admit that for years here I advocated as strongly as anyone not going ahead with the enterprise until we knew where it was to be and what its general plan was to be. In 1899, after a Senate amendment on a river and harbor bill, providing for the Nicaragua Canal, I brought in here a conference report which provided for the first Isthmian Canal Commission, appropriating $1,000,000 and directing its members to carefully examine and report upon all routes. I did not believe that the comparative merits of the different routes had been examined. In 1900, when the bill was pending here to go on with the Nicaraguan route, I did not believe we had the data sufficient to enable us to go on intelligently, and I voted with the minority against that bill. Now, after these years of examination, and the work is begun, we should prosecute it with vigor and with no degree of hesitancy whatever. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The hour granted to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] has expired.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio be permitted to conclude his remarks.

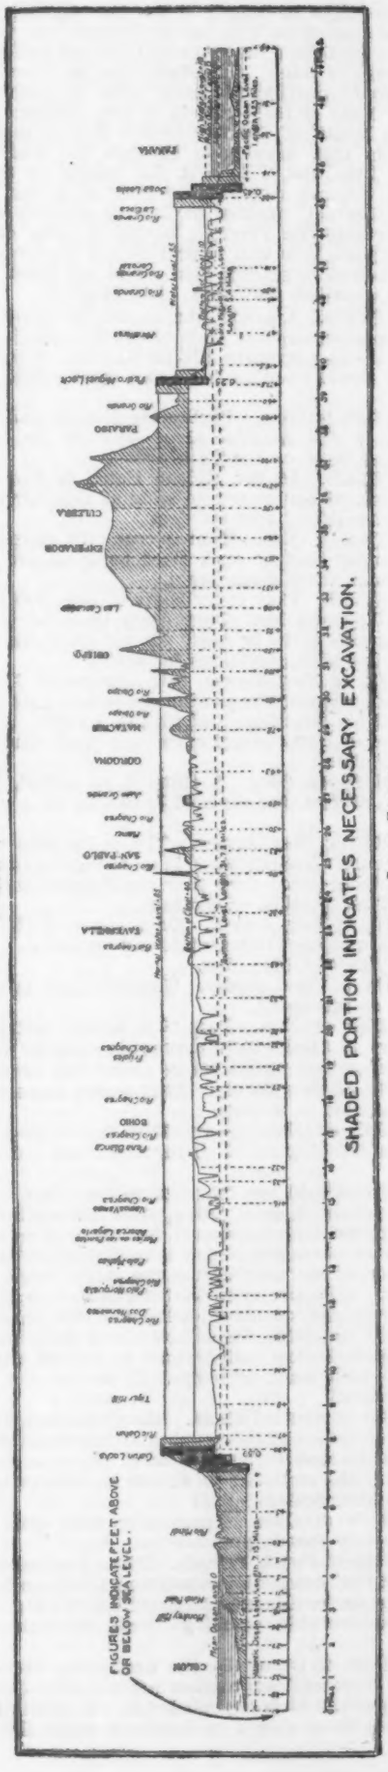
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I do not wish to object, but I think we should have a limit of time in some way.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I do not think I shall occupy more than fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may have thirty minutes more.

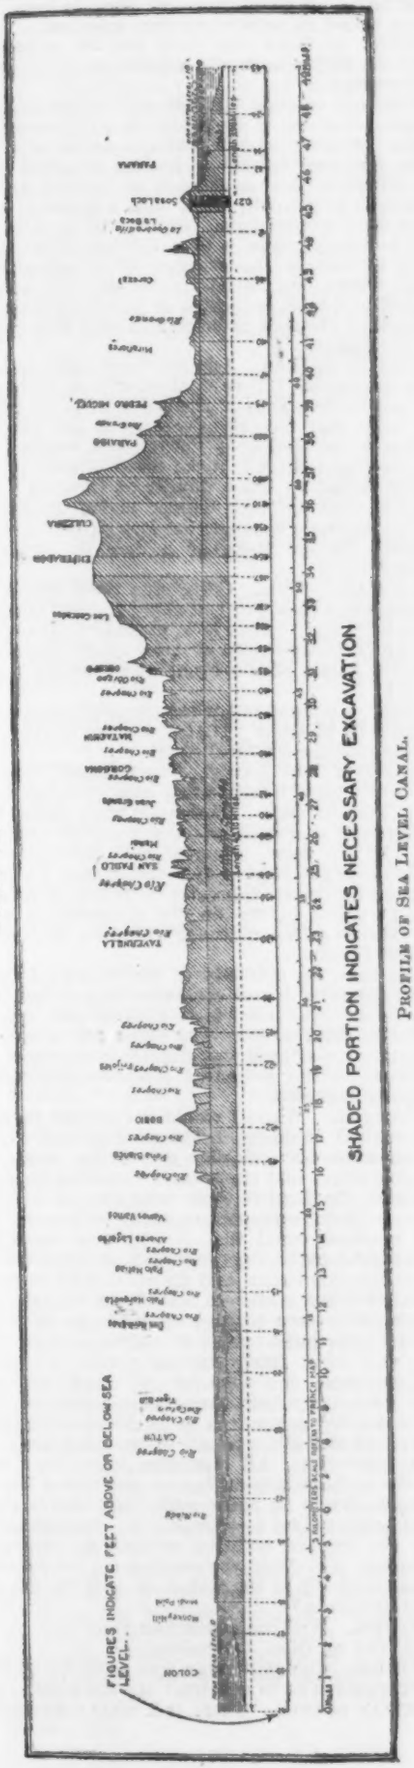
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may have thirty minutes longer. Is there objection?



There was no objection.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. The sea-level canal would not have been seriously considered except for the fact that a Board of Consulting Engineers was constituted not long ago, in which there were some foreign and some American engineers. By a vote of eight to five they favored a sea-level canal. I can readily imagine that a foreign engineer, with less knowledge of locks, with the Suez Canal as the great object lesson before him, would have, if not a bias, at least a predilection for a sea-level canal. It should also be said that two of the eight engineers who favored a sea-level canal in previous reports and when members of previous commissions declared in favor of a lock canal.

Mr. WILSON. How many of the eight were American engineers?



Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Three. General Davis, who, while a very able and learned man, is not a man who has had training as an engineer. He was one of the three Americans. The others were Mr. Burr and Mr. Parsons. Mr. Parsons says that if this were a commercial enterprise, one where a return of 5 per cent or something of that kind were expected, he would think a lock canal entirely proper. Mr. Burr, another member, was a member of the Commission from 1899 to 1902, which decided, after full consideration, in favor of the lock-level canal, and joined in a report to that effect. In the beginning, De Lesseps went there without any plan, without any borings, and went hastily ahead to construct a sea-level canal. After the expenditure of $247,000,000—and it is rather a threatening coincidence when you are told by the majority of this Board of Consulting Engineers that the sea-level will cost exactly the amount that De Lesseps wasted upon it, namely, $247,000,000—it was resolved that they would have to do something. A commission was convoked for the study of the plans. The members of that commission decided unanimously in favor of a lock canal. They did not put it on the ground of cost, either. Then there was another committee which made a report in 1898. It was called the Comité Technique, and it was intended to include the best engineers in Europe and America, and they unanimously reported in favor of a lock canal. M. Choron, an eminent engineer who was chosen as chief engineer of the new enterprise, in a paper which was read in London, said:

PROFILE OF SEA LEVEL CANAL.

> The gentleman has conveyed a misunderstanding; he seems anxious to convey the idea that I am opposed to the sea-level canal because of its expense, which is not the case. It is because of the impracticability of the plan.

Then the Isthmian Canal Commission of 1899 was constituted, and they reported unanimously in favor of a lock-level canal. In all, thirty-four of the best engineers of the world, including Mr. Hunter and Mr. Burr, two of the eight who recently favored a sea-level canal, declared for a lock-level canal, and there was no opinion given, after mature consideration, by any commission or body of engineers in favor of a sea-level canal until this body, this thirteen, of whom eight favor a sea-level and five a lock canal.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman will permit me, I understand you to say that there were eight of the thirteen favored a sea level and five a lock level? I think it was nine to four.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. It was eight to five.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to ask my colleague another question. You have spoken of the number of boards and engineers who have up to a certain day reported in favor of a lock-level canal. Was the question submitted to this Commission (I do not mean the last one) as to the feasibility of making a lock canal and not the cost of making a sea-level canal?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. By no means. When the question was submitted to this Comité Technique of the type of canal they would build they unanimously condemned the sea level and did not put it upon the ground of cost, but on the ground of its impracticability.

Mr. KEIFER. I understood it was on account of the expense alone.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Not at all, although that question was considered. The Comité Technique in 1898 in making their report said, in speaking of the sea-level project:

> It is not possible to think of utilizing the river—
>
> That is the Chagres—
> itself for the passage of shipping, by rectifications studied with this end in view; the irregularity of its flow and the violence of its floods are incompatible with a solution of this kind. The complete diversion of its course to the Pacific, far from the route of the canal, as was formerly suggested and in part studied, would be a colossal undertaking which it does not seem possible to adopt. Hence it is necessary to accommodate the character and needs of the river and canal to those of near neighbors, which it is very difficult to do in the case of a sea-level canal. Even if the outflow of a large part of the drainage basin were confined in temporary reservoirs it must be recognized that it is necessary to provide for the river by the side of the canal an artificial bed capable of carrying a very considerable volume in certain flood conditions. An artificial bed prepared above the level of the canal which could carry so large a flow would represent a work not only very difficult to practically accomplish, but also one which must be a permanent menace to the canal. Thus it may be said that the principal obstacle to the realization of a sea-level canal arises less from the difficulties inherent to the execution of the grand cut at the continental divide than from those caused by the presence of the Chagres in the district which must be crossed before reaching this divide, and that it perhaps would be not too much to insist that here is an insurmountable obstacle to such a conception.

It is noticed that in setting forth these conclusions no mention is made of cost.

Then, again, Monsieur Choron said in 1901, in commenting upon a paper read before the Institution of Civil Engineers in London:

> The paper gave a clear account of the present position of the matter from a technical point of view. The author was not correct, however, in stating that the technical commission's principal reason for putting aside the plan for a sea-level canal had been its cost and the impossibility of its yielding a profit as a commercial scheme. The reason had not been the cost, which, perhaps, might not be a much more important matter than in the case of the plan adopted, but the grave technical difficulties presented by the problem of regulating the Chagres River and protecting the canal against its floods. With a lock canal and the great central lake of Bohio, this problem admitted of easy solution; without that lake it was almost insoluble. Hence the author's view, that the nearer a lock canal approached to the sea level the better it would be, was not altogether justified, because really the inherent difficulty of the regulation of the Chagres River would be seriously increased by lowering the level of the lake of Bohio below that adopted by the technical commission.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if the adoption of a lock canal will obviate all the difficulties encountered from the flood waters of the Chagres River which would arise in case we adopt the sea-level plan?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Not altogether. There is no plan of any canal that will do away with all difficulties. You may just as well face that question; but they will be obviated in a far greater degree in this way. The most of the difficulty arising from the flow of waters is solved, and I may almost give an affirmative answer to the gentleman's question so far as the Chagres River is concerned. It will be noticed that the waters of the Chagres River below this dam flow off here [indicating course of the river from Gatun dam to its mouth], and above the dam they are taken care of by it. What I say is that there will always be a degree of difficulty arising from the great rainfall, which so saturates the earth that it erodes readily and is easily carried into the channels and cuts. These dangers would be infinitely greater in the sea-level canal. The number of disturbing streams would be very much greater and would also include all those which under the lock plan would be covered by the lake above Gatun. Then, too, the length of narrow channels in the canal, subject to erosion or overflow, would be multiplied several times over. The element of time at the Culebra cut, in case there is a sea-level canal, assumes great importance. One hundred and ten million cubic yards would have to be taken out and 53,700,000 cubic yards for a lock level. On the sea-level plan it is estimated that fully 40,000,000 cubic yards would be below the water level, much of it in the Culebra cut; it would have to be taken out of the water. Some means of communication would have to be adopted, so it could be carried away by the railway cars or in some other way. The whole problem of the Culebra cut is not so much to dig out as it is to carry away.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. A good part of the way, then, this lock canal will be above the level of the river?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Not all the way. It would be above the level of the river down to here [indicating on the map] and farther up for a considerable distance. An important fact is that its level in the lake created by the Gatun dam would be above the present level of the river wherever it crosses it.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Above all danger from flood water?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Certainly. So far as the Chagres River is concerned, there would be no danger to the canal from that; but from the other streams and the rainfall there would be some danger.

We come now to the matter of expense.

Mr. HAMILTON. Before the gentleman leaves that point, I should like to ask him, if it was deemed advisable to make a sea-level canal in later years, if the lock type of canal is now adopted?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Yes; although it would be a very expensive undertaking. It could be done by putting in locks here at Gatun, and on the Pacific side, by the side of those which were in use, lowering this level behind them gradually, and then, perhaps, another lock here, continuing the dredging or excavation to a still greater depth. It has been estimated that it would cost $208,000,000 to make that change.

Mr. HAMILTON. And it would be impossible for traffic to go on?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Oh, no; traffic would continue without any interruption. Of course if traffic were to be interrupted, it would be a much easier matter to excavate to sea level, because then you would let the water out from the upper level and dredge in the dry; but if the traffic continues, as it would have to be continued—because if you establish a commercial route you must maintain it—there would be this great additional expense. I will say, further, that of course if you are going to have a sea-level canal it would be desirable to dig it now—that is, I mean a sea-level canal within twenty or thirty years.

Mr. HAMILTON. If it were deemed better in years to come——

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Certainly it could be done.

Mr. HAMILTON. To have a wider and deeper canal, it would be possible?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Certainly, and the canal not be out of commission while the change was being made.

Mr. SIMS. Here is a question I wish to ask: If for any cause the dam at Gatun should be a failure, then the lock canal must be abandoned. Is that so?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. That is so. At least the present plan.

Mr. SIMS. What assurance has the gentleman that that dam will be an absolute success? It seems to me that is the question to be decided.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. The experience of men in building and maintaining dams in more difficult situations, and which are not by any means as massive, in different parts of the world—in India, in California, and even so near as Massachusetts—is a sufficient answer to that question.

Mr. SIMS. Is there any dam now in existence that will compare with this one in the amount of pressure that it will have to sustain?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I will say to the gentleman that a very simple principle of hydrostatics will satisfy him on that point. The pressure of the water upon a dam from a comparatively few feet behind it is just as great as it is from 10 miles. That is, in case there is no current, and there would be none here. If you will think of it a moment, you will know that such must be the rule. There will be here a column of water 85 feet high behind a dam 135 feet high, and dams have been built to sustain the pressure of a column of water 135 feet high. There will be no trouble on that score. The only danger that has been suggested is percolation underneath.

Mr. SIMS. I think it is important that that question should be fully considered.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I do not think there is any danger on that score whatever. There is another dam up here at Gamboa which would be necessary if the sea-level project were adopted. It is not quite fair for the advocates of one plan here to say, "Your dam is impracticable, unsafe, and founded on the sand, but mine is founded on a rock; mine is sure to be safe," because there is just as much danger at Gamboa as there would be at Gatun; just as much danger under the sea-level project at one place as there is under the lock project at the other.

Mr. SIMS. Would there be a dam or anything except a breakwater?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Certainly; there would have to be a dam at Gamboa. How are you going to keep out all this water unless you have one? Also, how, except by other dams, can you keep the water of seventeen or more other streams from wearing down the banks of the canal and swelling the currents of water in it?

Mr. SIMS. I understand what the gentleman refers to.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. That is a dam to prevent the water from getting into the sea-level canal.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. The Oakland dam, at Oakland, Cal., is 115 feet high, whereas this dam at Gatun is only 85.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. There are other dams which have a greater pressure to sustain without being of such massive construction. It has been estimated that this dam as projected here is six times as large as is required, but I think the people of the United States all appreciate a factor of safety.

I want to speak briefly on the comparative expense. The proposed expense of a lock canal would be, according to the estimates, $139,705,000.

It is true that the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers did place the figures somewhat higher, but they conceded the cost of a sea-level canal to be $247,000,000, while the minority placed it at $272,000,000. The difference in cost as estimated by the Commission of 1899 was slightly in excess of $100,000,000. The difference in the estimated cost of $108,000,000 has been very generally accepted.

Now, about time. While I would not put my judgment against that of a skilled engineer, I believe the controlling factor of construction under the lock plan will be the locks at Gatun and on the Pacific slope, and these can be finished in eight years, so as to complete the dam, if those who have it in charge can go ahead without embarrassment, in 1914. It is said by those that favor the sea-level canal that it will take twelve or thirteen years. The most tedious process in building a sea level would no doubt be the excavation and disposition of 40 feet depth and 200 feet in width below the sea level for 8.1 miles; and it would take a very brave man to give an estimate as to how long it would take to do that—twelve or thirteen years would be the minimum, and more likely twenty years. I should be glad to hear from some one who favors a sea-level canal of the method to take away this excavation estimated at 12,500,000 cubic yards, located a hundred to more than 300 feet below the natural crest of the hill, and all to be taken from beneath the surface of the water. All engineers who favor the sea level concur in the opinion that as far as excavation is concerned all possible speed should be made with the Culebra cut, as it will require the longest time to complete it. Suppose the plan is to take away the dredged material or spoil by railway; how will you accomplish it? Will the excavation be accomplished by dredge boats working in the water, or will the cut be kept free from water by pumps?

Mr. RHODES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. RHODES. The gentleman was speaking of the length of time that it would take to construct the different types of canal.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. There is a wide difference of opinion about it. Engineers say they can furnish a lock canal in eight years, and those who favor a sea-level canal say twelve or thirteen years.

I have already expressed an opinion both as to cost and time. There are two other things I would like to touch upon.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. I understand the canal is to be neutralized. I can understand how the Gatun lock would be beyond the range of fire, but under the project as the gentleman has explained it the Sosa dam comes very close to the Pacific coast line and would be in range of fire from battle ships in the Panama Bay. Would it not be better, as suggested by Engineer Stevens, to put the dam at Miraflores or Pedro Miguel?

Mr. BURTON. From a military standpoint, yes; but I am frank to say that in my judgment the only rational control of this canal is by treaty securing neutrality, just the same as the Suez Canal. The best protection is neutrality. So far as any fortress is concerned, I should prefer not to see a fort or a gun on the whole Isthmus, but have it protected entirely by agreement between nations. [Applause.]

Mr. OTJEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. OTJEN. The gentleman has said that a lock-level canal would do for fifty years. Is it not probable that it would do for much longer than that?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Certainly; and then it could be enlarged. The estimate for enlarging it from a lock to a sea-level canal has been put at $208,000,000, which, added to the $139,000,000 of original cost, would make $347,000,000, as against $247,000,000 for a sea-level canal at the beginning. The Government would, however, save the interest on $108,000,000 between the construction of a lock canal and a change to sea level.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. How about the cost of maintenance?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I have given some attention to that, but I do not think we have any data upon which to base a reliable estimate. It is generally estimated that it would cost more for the maintenance of a lock canal. Why? Because of the maintenance and operation of the locks. It will not do to let every master of a vessel, careless or careful, go through the locks managing his own boat. It will have to be taken charge of by an expert responsible to the Government when it reaches the locks, and thus the maintenance would be a matter of considerable expense.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. It is quite as important to take care of the canal after it is built as it is to sail ships over it. Does the gentleman know what progress has been made to secure neutrality for this Zone?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I do not know that there has been any effort—there is a general progress everywhere toward the neutrality of canals.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. It is the gentleman's opinion that there will be no difficulty in securing a guaranty of neutrality?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. None whatever. Neutrality for the Suez Canal was secured, all nations joining but one, as I recollect.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. There were two or three nations excepted.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Yes; but their refusal to become parties to the agreement did not assume any great importance.

Mr. DUNWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. DUNWELL. The gentleman promised some time ago to give us some opinions in regard to earthquakes. I hope he will.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I do not think I could make the subject of earthquakes more attractive to members of the committee than some other subjects about which Members would like to talk, but I will try to say something about it.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, can the gentleman from Ohio give us any comparative estimates of the annual cost of operating these two systems?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I would say in regard to that, that several estimates have been made. One places the annual cost at $2,400,000 for the sea-level canal and $2,800,000 for a lock canal. Another estimate is that the cost will be $800,000 more for a lock canal. I think, however, those are all in the air. I do not believe anyone can make any estimate at this time with any degree of accuracy.

Mr. MARTIN. Is not that going to be a very important part of the problem—the annual cost of operating the canal?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. It is an important problem. But the immediate problem is the completion of the canal, so that it may be ready for use. We expect to receive a return in the way of tolls. It is all a dead investment, and will be until it is finished. On completion the expense of maintenance will depend somewhat upon the amount of traffic. I do not anticipate the traffic will be nearly as large as those who have been most enthusiastic about it expect.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. If we have a dam and keep the waters of the Chagres from rushing into the canal, will not the checking of the water precipitate the sediment or silt, and will it not, therefore, go into the canal?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. No; because at times you must discharge through a spillway 15,000 cubic feet per second. In addition to that there are seventeen streams at different places below Bohio, and the cubic discharge of the Chagres is 50 per cent greater 10 miles below Gamboa, where the dam is, than it is at Gamboa. The chances are there would be a very large amount of silt in the canal, but the greatest amount of dredging would not be required naturally, because of silt carried in water, but by reason of the dirt washed into the canal by inflowing streams.

Mr. Chairman, if I have time, I wish to say just a few words in regard to earthquakes. Of course, no construction can be safe against possible earthquakes. I do not believe there is any great difference between the two types of canal as regards that danger. There are divers theories about earthquakes. The old one was that they were due to the fact that the earth was a mere crust on the outside of a molten mass, and that the heated material within was seeking exit. That naturally caused the strata to rise in the places where the pressure was greatest and the crust was weakest. Under this theory earthquakes would be associated with volcanic eruptions. Another theory now is that they are caused by the slipping of strata. The danger of an earthquake to a lock-level canal would not, I believe, rest upon the great locks. Their masonry is too massive to be affected by an earthquake unless it be of a kind almost beyond our comprehension. For instance, at San Francisco in the recent severe earthquake the forts erected by the Government remained intact. Some tall buildings remained intact. The Government building, which was the best constructed, remained intact, or that part of it which was completed. The masonry for these locks would far and away exceed in massiveness any of those structures that survived the San Francisco earthquake. The greatest damage to the locks would naturally fall upon the pipes through the masonry of the canal walls, which convey the water for lockage, and I do not believe that would be very serious. It could be repaired without very serious difficulty.

On the other hand, this great excavation in the sea-level canal, 373 feet deep at the lowest depth and with a maximum elevation rising to 600 feet on one side, would be a shining mark for an earthquake. I do not believe that anyone can argue in favor of one side or the other, so far as the earthquake proposition is concerned. As regards this dam at Gatun, there are some dams in California like the one proposed at Gatun. These survived the shock and retained the water behind them without any difficulty.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest to the gentleman that the water supply of San Francisco is contained in three reservoirs outside of that city—one in Lake Pilarcitos, one in Lake San Andreas, and one in Crystal Springs Lake. Those three lakes were located upon the fault which caused the recent earthquake. They are all artificial lakes, maintained by a dam, and the dam is constructed in a similar manner to the proposed construction of the lock canal; and they all had as severe a shock as could possibly be given, and every one of those three lakes remained intact.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlemen of the committee for their very friendly attention. [Prolonged applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman who made the point of order upon the amendment insist upon it?

Mr. LITTAUER. The point of order was reserved, Mr. Chairman, as I understood it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the amendment, in order that we may understand it.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, may I ask for a moment? The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WILEY] has something which he desires to have inserted in the RECORD bearing on this subject, and I know from a cursory examination of it that it is valuable, and I ask unanimous consent that he have two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I was not aware the gentleman from Georgia had the floor.

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey for two minutes.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I trust I may be pardoned for complimenting the gentleman from Ohio for the eloquent and instructive lecture which we have all enjoyed. I received this morning from Mr. Noble, who knows more about canals than almost all the engineering profession put together, a very concise and careful statement of the pros and cons in regard to a lock and a sea-level canal, and it is stated much better than anybody else could do it, and I therefore ask permission to insert Mr. Noble's remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that it may be read here.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. It is twenty-one pages, and I think it is rather too much to have read at this time.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. It would not take over twenty-one minutes to read it.

Mr. WILEY of New Jersey. That is not my request. I will take the gentleman from Pennsylvania aside and read it to him whenever he may desire.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The communication is as follows:

NEW YORK, June 14, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM H. WILEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WILEY: I am sending with this some notes on the Panama Canal problems, which you are at liberty to use in any way you please, with or without mention of the writer. If they prove to be of any interest or use to you, I shall be gratified. Doubtless they are too diffuse; they have been written hurriedly and disconnectedly. If any other points occur to you on which you would like notes, kindly advise me and I will do what I can.

Very truly, yours,

A. NOBLE.

Notes on the projects for the Panama Canal submitted by the majority and the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers.

The salient features of the sea-level canal as a navigation channel are a comparatively narrow channel, which is 150 feet wide at the bottom, with sloping sides for a length of about 20½ miles where the excavation is entirely in earth; 200 feet wide at the bottom for 19½ miles where the bottom is in rock or the so-called "indurated clay," and the remainder of the total length of 49.35 miles is made up mostly of harbor entrances and has widths of 300 to 500 feet. For about half the length of the 200-foot channel the sides are wholly of rock or indurated clay and vertical from the bottom to and above the water surface, but in the remaining half the top of the rock is under water, the earth sides above the top of the rock sloping to the water surface and above. A tidal lock is located near the shore of Panama Bay to be used to lock up from the Pacific into the canal at low tide and down into the canal at high tide. The extreme variations from mean tide are about 11 feet, making the maximum oscillation about 22 feet. The usual range of spring tide is 18 to 20 feet.

The main features of the lock canal, from the navigation point of view, are its locks and its broad navigation channels. Excluding the locks, there are less than 5 miles of channel which is less than 300 feet wide at the bottom, and more than two-thirds of the entire length varies in width from 500 feet to lakes miles in width.

SUEZ CANAL IS THE BEST EXAMPLE OF A SEA-LEVEL CANAL.

The best example of a sea-level canal is the Suez Canal. The depth of this canal is 31 feet, or 77½ per cent of the depth proposed for Panama. The present minimum width is 108 feet, or 72 per cent of that proposed for Panama, but is to be increased in the near future to 147.6 feet, which will be 98½ per cent of that proposed for Panama. In proportion to depth the width of the improved Suez Canal will be considerably better than the proposed sea-level canal at Panama, the bottom width of the Suez Canal being four and three-fourths times its depth, while the width of the sea-level Panama Canal is to be only three and three-fourths times its bottom width. For the largest ships which can pass through the respective canals the Suez Canal is obviously safer, as it has greater proportionate width.

ST. MARYS FALLS CANAL AND ST. MARYS RIVER BEST EXAMPLES OF USE OF LOCKS AND NAVIGATION IN EXCAVATED CHANNELS

The best example of a lock canal from the traffic point of view is the St. Marys Falls Canal, which completed its first fifty years of successful operation a year ago. While the canal is itself short, less than 2 miles long, in its neighborhood is a succession of artificial channels through islands, reefs, and shoals, with materials varying from mud to rock, the width varying from 300 to 1,500 feet, and the aggregate length exceeding 20 miles; through a somewhat greater distance the navigated channel passes through rivers and small lakes, where the free width is greater and the points of shoals projecting from the land on either hand are marked by buoys. Center-line ranges are established for both classes of channels. The sailing conditions are therefore very similar to those which would be obtained in the proposed lock-level canal at Panama. The ships traversing these channels are of larger average dimensions than those of any other lock canal in the world, and the annual tonnage through them is many times greater. It has been objected that the St. Marys Falls Canal is not a safe precedent for a Panama canal, because it is not a "maritime" canal. This is a mere play upon words. It has been said that the ships plying the Lakes are built to suit lock conditions. This is entirely erroneous. They are built for various uses—to carry passengers, to carry package freight, to carry grain, to carry iron ore, etc., but mostly to carry ore. There are no special appliances to enable them to pass canals, and none are needed. Any ship furnished with lines to tie up is adequately equipped to pass a canal. In view of its long and successful existence, the minority of the Board was warranted in considering the experience obtained there as perfectly applicable to the Panama lock canal, and that experience was much greater than had been gained anywhere else.

DELAYS AT LOCKS AND TRAFFIC CAPACITY.

It is evident that while ships arriving at Gatun from the Atlantic may come more rapidly than they can be locked through and therefore delayed there, they will be spared, in point of time, by passing the locks and then proceeding in regular order through the stretch to the next locks (at Pedro Miguel), and will be further delayed little or not at all awaiting lockage at Pedro Miguel; and the same at Sosa. In like manner, ships arriving at the Pacific may be delayed at Sosa awaiting lockage, but will find the Pedro Miguel and Gatun locks ready on arrival. This kind of delay, due to the bunching of ship arrivals, would occur with the sea-level canal at Sosa for ships from either direction and to practically the same extent as with the lock canal, unless, as some of the sea-level advocates hope, the tide lock can be left open a part of the time. Whether this is practicable and time saving is questionable. Mr. Tincauzer stated that the Kiel Canal North Sea lock is never opened through. At the Manchester Canal the charter requires that flood tide be admitted in order to discharge a volume of water from the canal into the Mersey at a point farther up to contribute to the scour of the river, a requirement justly considered onerous, and was unsuccessfully fought by the canal corporation. Mr. Bates states (p. 1690, Senate committee hearings, 1906) that no ships enter the Manchester Canal with the inflowing tide, so that the assumption of large saving of time by leaving the tide lock open is not quite warranted, and it is probable that the time lost waiting for a change of tide would be fully as great as the time required for lockage. The St. Marys Falls Canal affords valuable data as to the traffic capacity of a lock canal which, with due allowance for the greater number and size of locks at Gatun, are applicable at Panama. In the heavy traffic months of 1905 the traffic through one lock at St. Marys Falls Canal was at the rate of 40,000,000 tons per year; with duplicate locks, which are to be provided at Panama, this would be doubled, as the capacity of the St. Marys Canal lock is not nearly reached; the capacity of the Panama locks would be much greater, and if the ships were of greater individual tonnage, as will surely be the case at Panama before the traffic capacity of the locks is approached, the capacity of the locks would be correspondingly increased on that account, and an enormous aggregate would be reached. On the other hand, the greater lift, dimensions, and number of locks at Gatun would diminish the traffic capacity. Some time must also be lost refitting and making repairs to locks and machinery, but with ample allowance for all these an enormous tonnage, which the minority believe would be as much as 80,000,000 tons annually, could be passed without serious delays. It can not be insisted on too strongly that this estimate is firmly grounded on actual experience.

Vessels do not arrive at a port in uniform daily number, but for various reasons, largely from stress of weather, arrive in "bunches." When the capacity of the locks is approached and before it is reached, the delays to the last ships of the bunches become considerable, and when these delays become very large the traffic capacity of the locks is to be considered reached, although a still further increase is possible. The minority of the Board kept this consideration in view, and its estimated traffic capacity has reference to the amount which could be passed without serious delays.

One of the advocates of the sea-level canal stated before the Senate committee (see page 1587 of hearings) that "all the ships that pass the Soo lock pass it practically on schedule time. * * * There is a regular procession of vessels—that is what it amounts to—with fixed intervals between them. It is precisely like a railroad schedule. This is not an exaggeration." In regard to this statement I can only say that it is astonishing that anyone who has had the least information about that traffic could make such an erroneous statement, and I regret that Senator KITTREDGE was led to accept it. The passenger steamers, a very small proportion of the whole, keep within a few hours of schedule during two or three months of summer, varying more in the spring and fall; but nearly all of the vessels are freight carriers only, loading at various ports and unloading at various others, often delayed in both operations, but always leaving port immediately when ready, losing the least possible time, and running absolutely without schedule.

The section of channel less than 300 feet wide in the Panama lock plan is so short that the traffic capacity of the channel is unlimited, and as the capacity of the locks for traffic is limited, the sea-level advocates say truly that the traffic capacity of the lock canal is fixed by the traffic capacity of the locks. If, however, the vast capacity of the duplicate locks should be reached, others can be built, as has been done at the Soo, and the capacity increased to any desired extent. The need of such an increase of facilities implies such a prodigious development of the world's wealth that the cost of any needed increase of facilities would be no great burden. The same remark is true in a degree for the sea-level project, but I have not the slightest doubt that the demand for a broader channel in a sea-level canal would be made and met long before there would be any need of increased lock facilities in a lock canal, so that with a sea-level canal the burden of improvements would come earlier when the cost could not be as well borne.

SUPERIORITY OF BROAD CHANNELS.

That a demand for a widening of the sea-level canal would arise very soon can not be doubted by anyone who is informed as to the universal experience in waterways all over the world and considers the matter dispassionately. The Suez Canal was first made 26 feet deep and 72 feet wide at bottom, and was opened to navigation in 1869. A better channel was demanded almost immediately, although the average of ships was much smaller than now. The widening of the channel was opposed by many engineers and navigators, as stated before the Senate committee (p. 2172, hearings), some of whom even insisted that a wide canal would be more dangerous to vessels and that the proper course was to build a second canal of the same width as the existing one. Fortunately this was not done. The channel was widened and deepened with great benefit to navigation, and I refer to this ancient history of error only because the arguments for a narrow channel have been recently repeated before the Senate committee in justification of the sea-level width.

In the year 1886, before the Suez Canal was enlarged, 6.1 per cent of the ships passing through it ran aground. This delayed other ships to the extent of 9 per cent of the number passing—in other words, 15.1 per cent of the ships passing the Suez Canal in 1886 were delayed either by themselves grounding or by being obliged to wait because the channel was choked by grounded ships. In 1899, after the bottom width had been increased to a minimum width of 108 feet and in some stretches to 118 feet, the groundings were reduced to 2.1 per cent and the number of other delayed ships to 4.4 per cent, or a total of 6.7 per cent, or considerably less than half the proportion in the narrow channel. In the following year, 1900, the proportion of ships grounding was further reduced to 1.9 per cent; of other ships delayed thereby, 2.7 per cent—making a total of 4.6 per cent.

As the traffic in a narrow waterway increases, the risks to the ships increase by reason of the greater number of meetings, and therefore it is interesting to compare the proportion of ships delayed in the Suez Canal with that in the broader excavated channels between Lakes Superior and Huron. In the latter the number of groundings in 1905 was thirty-four, which was about one-tenth of 1 per cent of the number of ships passing. The length of these channels is only about one-fourth that of the Suez Canal, so that the above per cent should be multiplied by four, making 0.4 per cent, which is to be compared with 1.9 per cent, the best figure quoted for Suez. The average daily number of ships passing through the Soo channels in 1904 was about sixty-five, while the daily average through the Suez Canal was eleven in 1900; but notwithstanding the vastly greater density of traffic in the American channels, the danger of grounding was only about one-fifth as great. If the record of the groundings in the American channels for 1905 had been taken, the comparison would have been still more and far more favorable to them. The only reason for the comparatively favorable showing is the greater width of the American channels. Yet, with the facts as to the safety of navigation in these broad channels fully before him, one witness before the Senate committee questioned, or rather appeared to question, their relative safety, and over some three or four pages of testimony, in which, however, no direct, unqualified statement to that effect can be found.

The foregoing data are conclusive as to the greater safety of ships in broad channels as compared with narrow ones. It only remains to consider the safety of ships in locks and approaches to complete the comparison. In the report of the minority of the Board it was pointed out that the danger to a ship in the ordinary operation of a lock is practically nil, and this view was supported by the experience of fifty years at the Soo canals, with a total traffic of 360,000,000 tons, which greatly exceeds that of all the four best known and largest foreign ship canals. During the first nineteen years after the opening of the St. Marys Falls Canal, from 1855 to 1874, before the bottom width of the channel had been everywhere increased from 65 to upward of 100 feet, and while a rock slope remained in some portion, it was not unusual for a vessel to collide with the rock, with injury to bilge or wheel; but since the latter date ships sustain no injury in the canal, and as the approaches to the Panama Canal lock would be 250 feet wide and the sides vertical, ships would be even safer there. So far, therefore, it is obvious that the ship would be safer in a lock canal at Panama than in a sea-level canal.

ACCIDENTS AT LOCKS.

Only one other possibility of danger to ships in a Panama lock canal remains to be considered, which is that a ship bound down from the summit level may run down the gates of the upper lock, resulting in great injury or destruction to the ship as well as very serious injury to the canal and a long delay to navigation. This subject is treated so fully in the report of the minority of the Board (see page 89 et seq. of the report of the Consulting Board) that little can be added. The immunity from such accidents at the Soo canals during their entire existence, covering more than fifty years, is cited and the facilities for controlling the movement of ships explained, the absence of which at the Manchester Canal sufficiently accounts for the less successful experience there. I have read the rejoinder of the chief engineer of that canal to this portion of the report of the minority of the Board, which still leaves the conviction that if the Manchester Canal had been provided with long approach piers to the locks instead of having none, and if the regulations had required ships to be brought to rest alongside of them when still several hundred feet distant from the lock, with such requirements in regard to speed and number of lines out to shore when entering the lock similar to those enforced at the Soo canals, the accidents would doubtless have been avoided. The report of the minority of the Board proceeds to show how the risk can be diminished by additional gates, so that the summit level will always be protected by two pairs of gates, and if one of them should be carried away the danger to the other would not be great, so that the summit level would not be broken, and also points out that in other canals devices have been provided for shutting off the current, even if all other precautions should fail and the summit level be opened. Mr. Parsons misconceives the character of these devices and describes something the minority of the Board did not have in mind (page 1759, hearings). He appears to say that the minority did not finally provide for this device, but a reference to the detailed estimates will show a provision for it. At the Soo canals, where suitable approach piers have been provided, the locks have never been seriously harmed; at Manchester, which is remarkable by the absence of these precautions, gates have been ruined, and although even here no great disaster resulted, but the margin was doubtless small. The lesson from these conflicting experiences that better facilities should be provided at the Manchester Canal seems obvious. The minority make no claim that locks are not disadvantageous, but hold that their inconvenience and hazard have been grossly exaggerated. The inconvenience amounts to a delay of about four and one-half hours to ships passing the canal, which, for all except small ships and a small traffic, is more than compensated for by saving of time in the lake navigation.

The sea-level advocates have claimed that the upper lock of the Gatun flight would not have a usable length of 900 feet, as intended by the minority, unless the summit level were deprived of half its gate protection and left protected by a single pair only instead of two pairs, as claimed by the minority. The point was first raised by Mr. Parsons in the hearings, and when first brought to my attention I was inclined to agree with him, but a brief examination showed that he was in error, and I corrected my statement so as to show how a ship of the full length of 900 feet would be passed without leaving the summit level unprotected for a moment by less than two pairs of gates. General Ernst also took up the question, and in more detail in his statement before the committee. The locks proposed by the minority have a usable length of 900 feet and a usable width of 95 feet.

Several witnesses before the Senate committee have criticised with special violence the flight of three locks proposed at Gatun. Premising that it has been shown by the minority that the danger of a ship breaking through the gates of a properly designed and equipped canal is very small, it may be said at once that if such an event should happen, the greater the number of locks in the flight and the greater the lift the greater the probable injury to ships and gates; but, on the other hand, there is even less chance of such an occurrence in a flight of three locks than in three separate locks, because the movement from one lock into another involves even less risk than the movement from the approach into the first lock. The reason for adopting the project with three locks at Gatun was not, as one witness before the Senate committee asserted (p. 1768 of hearings), that the minority adopted this project because it was cheaper. This statement was unwarranted, because the witness could not have had full knowledge of the views of the five members of the minority and because it is not true. The project adopted was preferred because it gives a better navigation and is less complex, having fewer dams and waterways than any other project in which broad navigation channels are preserved in any degree. The same witness stated, also erroneously, that the minority adopted 900-foot locks because the Gatun site would not permit building them 1,000 feet long (p. 1761, hearings). The reasons for recommending a width of 95 feet and a usable length of 900 feet are given fully in the report of the minority of the Board (pp. 80, 81, and 82 of Report of Board of Consulting Engineers). The matter may be thus summed up: The combination of three locks in a flight renders an accident to a lock or a ship a little more improbable, but if an accident should occur the result would probably be more serious. The immunity from accidents at the St. Marys Falls Canal is cited as showing how small the chances of accident are. The advantage of the flight at Gatun, as compared with other possible projects, is the smaller number of dams and waterways and the better navigation, and incidentally, but only incidentally, the saving in cost.

I will note only one more point raised against the design of the locks. One of the witnesses advocating the sea-level plan before the Senate committee expressed a doubt whether a ship like the new Cunarders could pass the locks proposed for the lock canal (p. 2178, hearings). These ships are to be about 800 feet long, 88 feet wide, and 38 feet draft. As the clear lock length of 900 feet and clear lock width of 95 feet are in excess of the length and beam of these ships the doubt must relate to draft, and apparently was so understood by Senator KITTREDGE, who, in his speech of May 28, 1906, said:

"Furthermore, it is shown in the testimony that inasmuch as the summit level of a lock plan is necessarily of fresh water, the locks proposed by the minority do not afford sufficient depth of water in them to pass ships drawing 38 feet of water, which the largest ships now building will require." (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 7734.)

A sufficient answer is to state the facts briefly. For the reason that salt water is heavier than fresh water, a ship drawing 38 feet at sea will draw 39 feet in fresh water. The minimum depth of water in the summit level of the canal and the summit-level lock will be 42 feet, leaving 3 feet of water under the keel, which is ample and more than would be found under the keel near the Atlantic end of the sea-level canal at mean or low tide.

THE GATUN DAM.

The serious study of the Gatun dam site has followed the discovery that the conditions at Bohio are less favorable than had been supposed, and it would be of interest to review briefly the recent history of the Bohio project. The engineers of the French company were aware that coarse material existed at the site adopted by them for the Bohio dam, but believed the surface clay to be continuous and to form a blanket practically water tight. The dam proposed by them was to carry only 66 feet head of water; its crest was 49 feet wide and 10 feet above the surface of the reservoir. At the water line its width was 93 feet, or one-quarter of the width proposed for Gatun; at the base, about 450 feet, or about one-sixth the base width proposed for Gatun. There was to be no core wall. The dam proposed by the Isthmian Canal Commission of 1899–1901 was intended to carry a greater head of water, its maximum height to be 92 feet, or 40 per cent more than the dam proposed by the French. Some of the borings taken by the Commission showed that there were places in the vicinity of the dam where the permeable material in the river bed was continuous with that in the bottom of the valley. On the French location the Commission's borings showed that the depth to rock "was at least 143 feet below sea level at the deepest part;" but another site was found a few hundred feet farther downstream, where "the greatest depth to rock revealed by the borings was only 128 feet below sea level," and the Commission chose this site The dam was to have slopes of three horizontal to one vertical on both sides. The crest was to be 8 feet above the surface of the reservoir, its width at top 20 feet, and its base about 650 feet. It was to have a core wall composed of caissons filled with concrete sunk end to end by the pneumatic process to bed rock, surmounted by a concrete wall.

One member of the board, the late George S. Morison, who most engineers concede was by far the ablest engineer of his time, was never satisfied with this dam, and in 1903 presented to the American Society of Civil Engineers a remarkable paper on this subject, in which he advocated a dam corresponding in its essential features to the one proposed by the minority of the late Board of Consulting Engineers for Gatun. The dam was to be 2,000 feet wide, about three-fourths of the width proposed for the Gatun dam, and the head of water to be sustained, 92 feet, was a little greater than proposed for Gatun. He chose the French location, notwithstanding the greater depth to rock, and challenged the high estimates of permeability of the underlying sand and gravel which some had made, using data collected by Mr. Allen Hazen, a distinguished hydraulic engineer, and by Mr. F. P. Stearns, chief engineer of the metropolitan water and sewerage board of Boston, since then a member of the Board of Consulting Engineers for the Panama Canal and one of the minority of that Board. His project was much discussed and his views widely accepted.

The first Commission appointed to construct the canal, of which Admiral Walker was chairman, caused additional borings to be made at Bohio and found that the lowest part was at least 165 feet below sea level, which made sinking of caissons to rock so extremely difficult as to amount to impracticability. In the meantime the project for a dam at Gatun, which had received some consideration thirty years ago, was revived, mainly by means of a paper read before the American Society of Civil Engineers by Mr. C. D. Ward. The result of this was an examination of the Gatun site by means of borings. Although disappointing in not revealing rock at a moderate depth, a more careful study of the results indicated that this might be a favorable site for a great earth dam. Additional borings were requested by the Board of Consulting Engineers and made by the present Isthmian Canal Commission, and with the information thus collected the project now under such general discussion was prepared.

The Gatun dam is not unprecedented either in length or height, but the area of the opening to be closed by it has seldom, if ever, been equaled.

In speaking of the height of a dam, reference should be had to the head of water supported, when considering the work it has to do, rather than the height of its crest, because additional height above the surface of the reservoir only adds to its stability. In respect to head of water sustained, the Gatun dam is exceeded by several earth dams; it is largely exceeded by many masonry dams, and the Gamboa dam, proposed for the sea-level project, would exceed it nearly 50 per cent. The total length of the Gatun dam would be about 7,700 feet along the water line. For a little more than 5,000 feet the head of water against it would be 50 feet or more, and in this respect, and this only, the magnitude of the work it has to do is unprecedented. It has also unprecedented magnitudes in its features for giving greater safety, the height of crest being 50 feet above the surface of the reservoir instead of 5 to 20 feet, as customary; its breadth at the water surface being 374 feet instead of the usual 20 to 50 feet, and its breadth at the base being the immense dimensions of one-half mile, which is several times that of any existing dam of equal height. The distinction between the magnitude of the work it has to do and the magnitude of the features adding to and insuring safety have been confused in the discussion of this dam, and each of the three great magnitudes has been presented as adding hazard, while, in fact, two of the three add to safety.

The ground on which the dam will be built is a clayey material, in which pockets of sand were found in the borings, and the deepest portions of the ancient gorges, two in number, were found filled with sand and gravel. The underlying material, into which most of the borings penetrated, was somewhat like that found in the lower portions of the Culebra cut, sometimes called "rock," but more appropriately termed "indurated clay." It is expected to stand vertical in the sides of the canal in that cut without protection. It is water-tight, and will carry any load. The material near the surface has been described by sea-level advocates as "mud," but the borings showed this is not the case. A great part of it is so firm, and the material contains so much clay, that borings were made through great depths without protecting the sides by driving pipes, which are usually necessary in making borings, although pipes were generally used at Gatun in the tops of the holes. From some of the sand pockets water flowed over the tops of the pipes. This circumstance has been seized by the sea-level advocates as showing a free connection with the Chagres, from which a conclusion was drawn that water would permeate freely through it. That water did not permeate through it freely was shown conclusively by the small outflow; and the impossibility of a free connection with the Chagres was evident on the least reflection, from the fact that the tops of the pipes from which overflow occurred were several feet above the river level. The slope of the river is so flat that its surface for 10 miles upstream is below the tops of the pipes, and therefore the water could not have come from the river. The case was the ordinary one of ground water gradually draining through the ground to the water course, and filling sand pockets or sandy soil wherever met. The height of the pipes above the river in the vicinity proved conclusively that there could be no free communication with the river, and the overflow under such conditions showed the material between the boring and the river was permeable in only a slight degree, if at all. The finding of pieces of wood in some of the borings, instead of being a cause of alarm is reassuring, indicating that the current when it was deposited was gentle, a condition in which the finer particles of earth are also deposited, making compact material, as contrasted with gravel, which is deposited in or carried along by strong currents.

The present bed of the Chagres as far down as Bohio, 10 miles above Gatun, consists largely of gravel, and the river above Bohio is torrential in flood time. From Bohio to the sea the valley is broad, the current slackens, and only the finer particles are carried in the water and are deposited in the slack current. Under present condition and during recent geological periods it does appear probable that any coarse material has been carried far below the gorge at Bohio. Geologists believe that at some distant time there was a subsidence of the Atlantic coast. Before that time the gorges at Gatun were cut down into the indurated clay, and after this the whole formation subsided below sea level. The coarse sand and gravel in the bottom of the deepest gorge, revealed by the borings, was doubtless deposited either before the subsidence or at an early period of it when the current of the river through the gorge was still strong enough to move gravel. As the areas under water upstream became larger the gravel was dropped above Gatun, and only the fine material was brought there, and the upper portion of the gorges gradually filled with it as it is now found. The great advantage of Gatun over Bohio as a dam site is, that at the latter place the gorge is nearly filled with gravelly material, which in places is continuous from the surface to bottom of the gorge; while at Gatun the gravelly material is at the bottom of the gorge and is overlaid by 150 to 200 feet of fine material, through which percolation will be inappreciable.

Most engineers would prefer a masonry dam on solid rock, and my own preference has always been for this type; but the foundation rock must be of good quality to secure safety. Many question the advisability of inserting a core wall in an earth dam, but the practice has abundant support among capable engineers, although it is particularly important that the rock on which a core wall rests should be perfectly sound. The criticism of the original plan of the Croton dam, made by Mr. William R. Hill and quoted by Senator KITTREDGE, and the statement made by Mr. Hunter in his letter to the Senate committee in regard to the difficulties in the construction of a dam for the borough of Stockport, arising from finding the material on which the core wall was to be placed much inferior to what the borings had led the engineer to expect, are suggestive of similar difficulties at the site of the Gamboa dam if the sea-level plan should be adopted and the dam built. The region is volcanic, the rock variable in quality, the borings have not penetrated deeply into it, and it would not be surprising if disappointing conditions should be found there. It is not my desire to provoke alarm about the stability of the Gamboa dam, and I am confident that no difficulty would be met there which engineering skill could not overcome.

My own preference for a masonry dam where it is practical to build one has been frequently expressed. I favored the plan of a dam with a core wall for Bohio when a member of the Isthmian Canal Commission of 1899–1901. I did not readily accept the plan proposed by Mr. Morison for the Bohio dam, although convinced that the discussion of his paper developed no fact or weighty argument against his view. The additional investigations concerning permeability made and reported by Mr. Stearns, the immense height and width of dam proposed for Gatun, elements of safety in magnitude beyond all precedent in earth dams, and the more favorable natural conditions there for an earth dam leave, in my opinion, no question whatever as to its stability and practical impermeability.

CURVATURE.

The sea-level advocates before the Senate committee stated correctly that the total curvature in degrees or, in other words, the total change in direction is a little greater in the lock plan than in the sea-level plan. The difference is small and unimportant. The excess is found mainly at Bohio, where the sea-level canal is located across the hill, while the lock canal, by reason of its higher elevation, can be located satisfactorily around it, following the valley. The facts as to sharpness to curvature have not been fairly stated by them. There is no place in the lock-plan canal where a curve of the ruling radius of the sea level can not be laid down. In other words, in any of the places where a change in direction occurs in the lock-plan canal, a section of the sea-level canal of its usual curvature could be placed without touching anywhere the sides or bottom. With a narrow canal long easy curves are essential, as shown by ample experience at Suez and elsewhere, and the sea-level canal is designed correctly in this respect. On the other hand, in broad channels, widened at the angles on the inner side, as in the lock plan, vessels will make the turn more easily and safely by turning more sharply, which the broad water permits. This is also shown by even more ample experience in the St. Marys River. In the lock plan ships could make all the turns on curves as easy as those of the sea-level canal; but experience shows that with broad channels the ships are handled differently and with advantage. This is illustrated by several diagrams attached to the report of the Board of Consulting Engineers, on which the actual courses followed by quite a large number of ships in similar cases are laid down.

EARTHQUAKES.

The San Francisco earthquakes have evoked from the sea-level advocates renewed alarm about the danger to the locks and dams of a lock canal. One of them (see page 7733, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD), after describing how either a masonry or an earth dam, particularly the latter, might be harmed by an earthquake, adds, "Personally I should not be afraid of either of them," which seems to be a judicious conclusion. The locks, however, he believes would be subjected to derangement, the summit level drawn off, and the lock mechanism thrown out of order. This opinion must have been written before the reassuring reports reached us of the entire immunity of the dams along the line of greatest earthquake intensity, both of earth and of masonry. An earthquake that was withstood by lofty steel-frame buildings could not be reasonably expected to destroy a mass of masonry practically buried in the ground. Many references have been made to "the delicate adjustment of lock gates" and to "delicate lock machinery." A lock gate is about as simple and massive a piece of structural work as can be imagined, and could be operated even if the walls of the lock were slightly displaced. Lock machinery is of the simplest character. The San Francisco earthquake should dispel rather than encourage apprehension about an isthmian canal of any description.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the usual leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, as there may be some tables, etc., which I desire to insert.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Does the gentleman from Georgia insist upon the point of order? Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order, and I think it ought to be sustained. This is not a limitation upon an expenditure of money solely. It undertakes to limit——

Mr. LITTAUER. Do I understand the gentleman from Georgia insists upon the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has made the point of order and is proceeding to argue it.

Mr. BARTLETT. If anyone desires to discuss the question, I am perfectly willing to reserve the point of order.

Mr. GROSVENOR Will the gentleman from Georgia yield for a moment, that I may make a request pertinent to the discussion which has just taken place?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly; I will state to the gentleman from Ohio that if anybody desires to discuss the proposition I will reserve the point of order. All I desire is to have it reserved and passed upon.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], in connection with the extension of his remarks in the RECORD, may print—reduced copies of course—the maps with which he has illustrated his address and such documents as——

Mr. TAWNEY. I will suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that the request ought to be in the form of an order. Under the law it could not be done except by the consent of the Joint Committee on Printing, but the House, of course, can order it to be done.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the Joint Committee on Printing may be directed to print these maps.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the Committee on Printing could order that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not without the action of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. But the action must be taken in the House, and not in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well; I will postpone it until the House is not in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BARTLETT. If anybody else desires to discuss the proposition, I am perfectly willing to reserve the point of order. If not, I desire to make it and have it ruled upon. Now, the amendment, as I understand it, is a proposition to limit not the amount, but the proposition is to limit the discretion now vested by law in the President as to how this canal shall be constructed and what its character shall be. Under the law enacted in 1902 the President was directed as follows:

The President shall then, through the Isthmian Canal Commission hereinafter authorized, cause to be excavated, constructed, and completed, utilizing to that end, as far as practicable, the work heretofore done by the New Panama Canal Company, of France, and its predecessor company, a ship canal from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean. Such canal shall be of sufficient capacity and depth as shall afford convenient passage for vessels of the largest tonnage and greatest draft now in use, and such as may be reasonably anticipated, and shall be supplied with all necessary locks and other appliances to meet the necessities of vessels passing through the same from ocean to ocean, and he shall also cause to be constructed such safe and commodious harbors at the termini of said canal and make such provisions for same as may be necessary for the safety and protection of said canal and harbors.

The President, in his message, said that under the act as he had construed it Congress seemed to contemplate a lock canal. Now, Mr. Chairman, if that be true, the discretion being vested by this act of 1902 in the President to proceed as he has done, to finish and complete a lock canal, and which he will do, this provision is unnecessary and this simply reenacts existing law, and is therefore obnoxious to the rule. I will read to the Chair an authority which I find on page 349 of the Manual, decided in the Fifty-eighth Congress:

A limitation on the discretion exercised under the law by a bureau of the Government is a change of law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not mean when I make this point of order that I am in favor of a sea-level canal. I do not want to convey that impression. I do not want to say by that that I have come to the conclusion that we ought to have a lock canal or I am in favor of that kind of canal; but what I do mean to say is that I do not think that we ought on this appropriation bill to determine by this amendment that we are to decide now in this way to have the particular kind of a canal that is suggested by the amendment. As we know, if I may be permitted to say so, the Senate is now considering the question as to what type of canal it will declare shall be built—a lock canal or a sea-level canal—and they are to determine that question by a vote on next Thursday, the 21st instant. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House have not considered anything in reference to this subject except to hear the testimony of the chief engineer, Mr. Stevens. I make this statement in order to show that I do not make the point of order for the reason that I am opposed to a lock canal or because I am in favor of a sea-level canal. But I do not believe that this House, in this great work that we are undertaking, ought now and in this manner limit the character of the canal. I believe this amendment is obnoxious to that provision of the rule which says that we can not change existing law or enact new legislation on appropriation bills. This is a limitation, as I understand it, on the discretion that is vested in the Executive by the act of 1900, and not merely on the manner of expending the money, and it does change the law as it now exists.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, this seems to me to be a very plain case. The proposed amendment does not change the law. It simply limits the appropriation. It has been held over and over again, and it really needs no argument to show, that by withholding an appropriation entirely Congress does not change any existing law. It may be, as the gentleman from Georgia says, that the President now has, under existing law, the discretion to build the canal either upon the sea-level plan or upon the lock plan, but surely if Congress should withhold an appropriation entirely it would not change that law. We would simply leave the President in the air. He could do nothing, but Congress would not have changed any law.

It has been repeatedly held that as Congress may entirely refrain from appropriating, so it may appropriate with such limitations and conditions upon the appropriation as it sees fit. It may not, or at least the House may not, under its rules, lay any command upon the President or any other officer, any positive command to do any particular thing in any particular way in a general appropriation bill, but we may appropriate money to be used in a particular way, or else not used at all. We simply refuse to appropriate money to be used in any other way.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to ask the gentleman, if this amendment prevails, would it not become a permanent law so far as the character of the canal is concerned?

Mr. OLMSTED. It would become permanent only so far as the amount of money appropriated by this bill is concerned. It would not be incumbent or necessary for the President to use the money at all. In that sense it would not control his discretion. Congress says he may use it for a lock canal, but Congress says we appropriate nothing for a sea-level canal.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the effect of the amendment does enact the permanent canal to be constructed, then it would violate the rule, would it not?

Mr. OLMSTED. If we enacted a law here expressly commanding——

Mr. BARTLETT. If the effect of the amendment is to fix permanently the character of the canal, then it does violate the rule.

Mr. OLMSTED. No more than in the sense that if we should not make any appropriation at all we might be held to have violated the whole law on the subject of the canal.

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take up time on this, but simply call your attention to a decision made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], then in the chair, found in section 514 of the book on Parliamentary Precedents, where it was ruled by the gentleman I have mentioned that although the Postmaster-General had under the law discretion to transport the mails any way he saw fit, nevertheless a provision in an appropriation bill limiting a certain appropriation so that it could be used only for transportation of mail by pneumatic tubes was in order.

I will call attention to a later decision, in the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, found on page 2877 of the RECORD, which I will send to the Chair, in which the then occupant of the chair [Mr. BOUTELL] called attention to an earlier ruling made in the same Congress. He cited this from the earlier ruling:

The Chair will call attention to the distinction between a limitation upon an appropriation and a positive enactment which limits the powers of Government officers under existing laws. A mere limitation of the appropriation is in order. There is no obligation on the House to appropriate at all, and therefore it may provide that the money appropriated by it shall not be used in any except such manner as may be specified in the bill. A limitation is best expressed in the negative, as that the appropriation shall not be available unless used in a certain way. That leaves an option. The money can be used or not used, but if used it must be in the manner specified. No law is changed, because there is no obligation to expend the money at all.

And then Mr. BOUTELL proceeds:

It appears, therefore, that the latest ruling by a Chairman of the committee on this question, in summing up all the previous decisions on this point, makes it perfectly clear that an appropriation is subject to such limitation as that expressed in this paragraph.

I call attention to the paragraph which was then under discussion, which was:

That no part of the moneys herein appropriated for fulfilling treaty stipulations shall be available or expended unless expended without regard to the attendance of any beneficiary at any school other than a Government school.

That was held to be a limitation, not upon the law, not upon the discretion of the officer, but upon the appropriation. The amendment now in question is even more clearly a limitation upon the appropriation merely and not a change of existing law. It does not say a sea-level canal shall not be built, but simply that no part of this particular appropriation shall be used for that purpose. The same point of order made against amendments of like character was overruled not less than fourteen times in the Fifty-eighth Congress. [Cries of "Rule!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the words of the amendment constitute a limitation on the appropriation, and not a change of existing law. The precedents are so numerous and the rule is so well established and clearly defined that the Chair does not feel obliged to cite a ruling at length or cite the precedents. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. WANGER. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. TAWNEY. I move that all debate on the amendment close in ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Minnesota that before debate can be limited it must begin. There must be at least five minutes' debate.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, above the din of conflict over the relative advantage of the lock or sea level type of the isthmian canal—which unfortunately has taken a quite too intensely partisan character—may be heard in chorus the voice of all friends of the proposed waterway for an early and final determination of that type in order that its construction may be speeded as greatly as the vastness of the undertaking and its manifold difficulties will permit.

The Canal Commission and its distinguished chief engineer, the predecessor of the latter, and that grand patriot, Gen. George W. Davis, with all others connected or familiar with the question, agree that a point has been reached where the maximum satisfactory progress is no longer possible unless it is with a view to the construction not of either, but of one of those types. And while the subject has not had exhaustive debate in this body, we have had the advantage of such able and exhaustive reports and reviews thereof and supplemental explanations and recommendations that we are doubtless more than ordinarily well prepared to voice the judgment of this branch of the Congress, and fully as well as we may hope to be in the reasonably near future.

Probably everybody prefers a sea-level canal of equal safety and facility for navigation as one with locks, if it be reasonably attainable; and probably we agree that none such is possible, except at considerably greater expense. It is, therefore, no less a question of engineering than one of sound business policy which should control our action upon this amendment. The address of the President to the Board of Consulting Engineers so tersely and completely states the issue that reference to that important utterance suffices.

The Board of Consulting Engineers included men so distinguished in their profession and lofty in character, who gave such studious thought to the problem and were so thoroughly informed of all its phases, that had the report been unanimous the country might and doubtless would have accepted its conclusions without question, however eminent the advocates of an opposite type might be. Is it not safe, therefore, to conclude that either project, whether of the majority or of the minority, is worthy of our faith, and that the estimates of time and of cost may be safely averaged upon the estimates thereof, not only which each branch puts upon the project which it recommends, but also which it puts upon the project of the other?

A careful, if not exhaustive, study of the reports of the majority and minority and of much other literature of the question convinces me that either canal will afford satisfactory navigation to all shipping that will use the canal within many years after its completion, and that the volume of that shipping will probably be much less than is generally estimated. It is not so much for the tonnage that is to be looked for in the immediate future to use the canal as it is measured by number or by size of ships, but for other all-sufficient reasons that I regard the project as one of the mightiest ever undertaken.

The probable tonnage of the canal is an element that can not wisely be ignored in determining the amount to be expended in its initial construction. That tonnage can not be measured by Suez because of the great difference in the location of the population and trade of the world. Western Europe and southern and eastern Asia have a traffic vastly exceeding that between our eastern coast and South America, while our transcontinental railways will doubtless hold all but a fraction of the traffic between the eastern and western parts of the United States. Suez has no such rivals. In an article in the Royal Geographical Society Journal of December, 1903, Col. G. E. Church reviewed the estimate of the probable tonnage of the canal by the Isthmian Canal Commission of 1899–1901 and other data, with the conclusion that the canal would probably attract less than 2,000,000 tons per annum at its opening. While his conclusions will doubtless be exceeded, the facts he presents are worthy of consideration.

Upon the trip of the Board of Consulting Engineers to the Isthmus Mr. Welcker remarked that the building of the canal would "transform the map of the world," and it doubtless will eventually; but it will not substitute land where there are now oceans, and years will pass before its harvest will be reaped. Meantime we shall have an annual interest charge of more than $4,000,000 at 2 per cent per annum upon the investment in constructing the cheapest type proposed, besides more than half that sum in maintenance and operation.

Our country has such immense resources that it is able to spend five hundred millions or more in building the canal, but why should we spend any larger sum than necessary to accommodate our Navy and probable commercial needs is not apparent. We may owe to the world as to ourselves to build a waterway that can be used with safety and convenience and not in the reasonably near future require substantial enlargement, and that duty ought to be fully met by a canal that can be navigated on any day of the year by a ship of 93 feet beam, 900 feet long, and 35 feet draft.

As the lock type recommended meets this requirement and is over one hundred millions less expensive to build, and may be finished in from three to five and possibly ten years' less time than the projected sea-level type, and as this amendment does not bind the President and Canal Commission to any special feature of any type of lock canal, I shall vote for it; all the more heartily because personal association upon the Isthmus with engineers engaged in the work made me know their unanimity in behalf of such type prior to the report of the Consulting Engineers and the subsequent action of the Commission, the Secretary of War, and the President in favor of the report of the minority of the Consulting Engineers.

The men whose health is involved in their connection with the enterprise believe they may prudently continue in that labor if the canal is built with locks and share in their humbler sphere in the honor of its construction with a hopeful future beyond, and they will be inspired with zeal and confidence by the adoption of the amendment. Their pride in the project is no less than that of the President, and although their courage is great they will be discouraged, if not dismayed, by the herculean task of excavating the Culebra cut to 40 feet below sea level.

If this work were to be done in the Temperate Zone, with its superior climate and labor, the case would be very different, and a calculation of the probable daily capacity of steam shovels and period for digging through the Isthmus would be more reliable. Yet even here the uncertainty is great, as the statement of Mr. Randolph of work on the Chicago Drainage Canal clearly shows. Mr. Quellennec, the eminent consulting engineer of the Suez Canal, while stanchly advocating the sea-level type, put on record his valuable judgment as follows:

> From a general point of view I think that a sea-level canal is preferable to a multi-lock canal, and must be recommended as giving greater safety of navigation and facility of operation. But in making such recommendation I feel the necessity of showing clearly to the United States Government the great difficulties which, in my opinion, will occur in the completion of the Culebra cut.

This conscientious adviser commends by his candor, no less than by his fame, his every utterance, and lends special significance to his other convictions, notably among which are:

> * * * I think that a lock canal should be considered only as a temporary one, built in order to minimize the amount of immediate work and first cost, and so constructed that it may be easily turned into a sea-level canal.
> Consequently, in my judgment, if a lock canal should be constructed, it should have separate locks and a summit level of 85 feet, obtained by adding to the 60-foot summit-level plan one more lock of about 30 feet lift, placed on each side of the Culebra cut near Obispo and Paraiso.

The 60-foot level canal will require the building of the Gamboa dam for the control of the floods of the Chagres, as the additional summit level suggested by Mr. Quellennec would require it to feed that level, and it is a question whether that dam is not an advisable feature in any event. It can have its foundations constructed simultaneously with the foundations of the Gatun locks and dam, and the consensus of the engineering evidence is that only in the actual construction of works are the real conditions found.

The surest expedition will be made in the building of the canal by having the work properly balanced, and the persuasive reason why a sea-level canal will take several years more than one of higher level is because the excavation at Culebra can not be hastened in proportion to the quantity to be excavated. The minority of the engineers estimate the period for the building of the Gatun locks will take nearly as long as the excavation at Culebra to 40 feet above mean sea level.

Chief Engineer Stevens has practically the same opinion, having recently stated to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House that it is possible to build the Gatun locks and dam in six years, although he always figured on seven or eight years, to be conservative and safe, and that the completion of the Culebra excavation should be done "in practically the same length of time—not to exceed six years." He further said:

> Although I confess some of the engineers do not agree with me, I think the Gatun dam and locks can be built in practically the same time as the Culebra cut under the lock plan. I know I am alone in that opinion on the Commission.

Now, if it develops that the project for the three duplicate locks in flight at Gatun is either impracticable in whole or in part after the foundations are uncovered, or that eight or more years are required to build them, whereas Culebra cut can be excavated to within 15 feet of sea level in a less period, we shall as greatly as vainly lament that we made no provision for completing the canal at 60-foot level. The latter level is very attractive in and of itself, and a flight of two locks is less objectionable than of three—saving nearly one-third the time of lockage, some of the water lost by leakage and by evaporation, a considerable percentage of the cost of operation and maintenance, and avoiding nearly one-third of the water pressure upon whatever pervious material or channels there may be under the Gatun dam.

No apprehension can be reasonably entertained against the strength of the Gatun dam. But there is room for misgiving respecting the possible percolation or flowage through the bottom of the geological valleys beneath it. The weight of the dam may compact the pervious material below the blanket of fine material, or it may have little or no effect upon it. The flowing water may come from the Chagres or other sources above the site of the dam and much below the intended water surface, and with additional pressure and supply may seriously diminish the volume of impounded water in the dry season. Because it rose 10 feet above the river level it is assumed by Mr. Stearns that it did not come from the river, as it is more than 10 miles upstream until elevation +10 is reached, and that it did come from adjacent high ground.

Mr. Stearns may be right, but he may be wrong. There is the condition presented that the bottom and sides of the valleys are of impervious indurated clay or soft rock, and over the loose material through which the water flows is fine sand—a blanket of impervious material, and yet the water is in there and it is flowing. It is surely a problem for further thorough investigation whether there are not subterranean channels which may make uncertain the filling of the Gatun dam to its intended height and secure holding of the water, and if such channels exist there can be no question of the need of ample provision against possible failure either by closing those channels or by reducing the height to which water is to be impounded, or both.

It is well known that water flows through subterranean channels for many miles, and there may as likely be subterranean as transverse crevices whereby the bottom of those geological valleys is fed with water.

The quantity of evaporation in the tropical climate is unknown, but it must be great, and its effect upon Lake Gatun will, of course, be felt, if felt at all, whenever there is a protracted dry season and the volume of water for lockages and otherwise escaping exceeds that flowing into the lake. If the 5 feet of summit reserve water allowed for this season is gone while the inflowing streams are at their minimum flow the subsequent reduction must be with accelerating speed until nature relieves the situation.

In case of protracted drought a great reserve such as Lake Gamboa would afford at elevation of +150 would be of inestimable value, and the opening of the canal might be at least several months earlier by its utilization.

It is suggested by the minority report that if more water is needed by reason of such vast traffic that Gatun Lake does not have sufficient that a dam be built at Alajuela. The latter site would then almost necessarily have to be chosen because of the drowning out of the lower part of the Gamboa site by Lake Gatun, but the dam would not have more than about one-fourth the capacity of a dam with equal head at Gamboa and be at least 8 miles farther from the line of the canal. It would have to be guarded and closely inspected, and the distance is a material element.

It is easier to build a dam at Alajuela than at Gamboa, although there is not the certainty of safety in the former that is usually assumed. Replying to General Abbott's contention of the greater safety of a dam at Alajuela than at Bohio, the late George S. Morison suggested that only in the ease with which the structure might be erected was Alajuela a superior site, and referred to the limestone rock along the river above and the frequent instances in which cavities exist in such rock and the trouble that they occasion.

It is assumed from borings and the study of geologic conditions that a good rock foundation for an all-masonry dam is at sea level at Gamboa. Yet Mr. Quellenec pointed out to the Board that at the Assuan dam, and Mr. Sterns that at the Wachusett dam, that when the foundations were dug it became necessary to go 15 to 20 feet deeper before the rock was satisfactory. It may be so here and it may be so at Gatun. Why not, when progress is so desired and important, insure it by simultaneously prosecuting the great essential feature in the control of the Chagres in the two types of canal, one exceeding +67.50 and the other at or below that elevation, when each has so great inherent utility? Or rather, why not in the project for initial summit level of 82 to 87 (generally called 85) underwrite the work by an adjunct that will serve many useful purposes of that plan and be invaluable in a possibly necessary alternative plan?

There are contingencies of so many kinds incident to the construction of any form of canal that no man or body of men can definitely state in advance the progress which will be made in any great feature. The minority engineers believe that their plan is well balanced, but actual experience may show the contrary and confirm the judgment of Messrs. Hunter, Wallace, and others that the Gatun lock and other structures will take some years longer than is expected; and hence the wisdom of proceeding on such lines that the best conditions may be secured. If a suitable dam at Gamboa will permit the opening of the canal even two years earlier than without such structure, its erection is fully justified.

It was with reluctance that Congress and the country turned from Nicaragua to Panama, the former being so many miles nearer our mainland and shortening so substantially the distance between our Atlantic and Pacific ports. But there was the consolatory thought that at Panama at some time the canal might be at sea level, and the advantages of unimpeded navigation and of a water supply that could only fail by the drying up of the oceans, are so substantial that even the remote possibility of them were cogent in winning acquiescence in the final choice.

And yet no promise was then held out that the initial construction of the canal at sea level was practicable. On the contrary, the Isthmian Canal Commission, in its report, not only said:

> This Commission concurs with the various French commissions which have preceded it since the failure of the old company in rejecting the sea-level plan. While such a plan would be physically practicable and might be adopted if no other solution were available, the difficulties of all kinds, and especially those of time and cost, would be so great that a canal with a summit level reached by locks is to be preferred.

But in an appendix entitled "Historical Notes Relative to the Universal Interoceanic Canal Company (1880–1894) until the Organization of the New Company," it showed that it was the personal insistence and prestige of Ferdinand de Lesseps, who had so signally triumphed in the building of the Suez Canal, which led to the adoption of the "constant-level" plan by the International Congress of Survey for an interoceanic canal in 1879, and the notes state:

> By considering the names of those who abstained from voting, of those who were absent, and of those who voted "no," it is seen that de Lesseps had against him a majority of the engineers and of the contractors who were members of the congress.

Accordingly, in 1902, it was known that the great preponderance of professional engineering opinion was that the important elements of time and cost made a lock canal the advisable form of construction, and those elements are at this time almost as potential as they were then. And there is no less reason now than there was then to indulge the hope that when the volume of tonnage and size of ships and military or other necessities really require a canal at sea level that it can and will be constructed.

The board of consulting engineers unanimously agreed:

> * * * That it is practicable, from an engineering standpoint, to transform any lock canal which it has considered into a sea-level canal—> that it is possible to turn any lock canal which it has considered into a sea-level canal without interrupting the traffic upon it.

And—

The members of the Isthmian Canal Commission entered the realm of prophecy in their review of the reports of the consulting engineers and seem to all be of the opinion expressed by Admiral Endicott:

> An 85-foot summit lock canal once constructed means a lock canal always. If a sea-level canal is desired, it must be built directly without first building a lock canal.

And the other members of the Board state:

> The Board of Consulting Engineers is unanimous in the opinion, in which we concur, that if a sea-level canal is ever to be constructed, it should be constructed as such from the first.

This is such a gross misstatement it is difficult to understand how it came to be made, the Board having said:

> That if a sea-level canal is to be constructed in the near future it should be built directly without first building a lock canal.

If the Commission will realize the material difference between what is inadvisable at the present or in many years to come from what may be not only advisable but necessary in the somewhat remote future, it may appreciate the propriety of certain features which would not otherwise be apparent.

The construction of the Gamboa dam, if a good foundation exists for a masonry dam, will provide an all-important basis for possible future transformation to sea level whenever that may become advisable. And the omission to build that dam and the burial of its possible rock foundation under 82 to 87 feet of water will be the introduction of a very serious obstruction to transformation. While we are saving our generation one hundred and more millions and leaving to posterity to provide for its future needs, let us not add to the essential cost of transformation that involved in the failure to now demonstrate the practicability of an all-masonry dam founded in bed rock at Gamboa, and if the project proves practicable the failure of its early construction. Especially when such construction has its important advantages in any contingency and vitally important advantages in possible contingencies.

The Commission in recommending the plan of the minority very properly did it, "subject, of course to such changes as may be found desirable during construction," and the President in his message, transmitting the report, said:

> In my judgment, a lock canal, as herein recommended, is advisable. If the Congress directs that a sea-level canal be constructed its direction will, of course, be carried out. Otherwise, the canal will be built on substantially the plan outlined in the accompanying papers, such changes being made, of course, as may be found actually necessary. * * *

And our legislation in adopting the lock plan should provide for whatever modification may become necessary, or advisable, as construction progresses.

The authority to make substantial modifications in the plan should exist so that at no time need the President and those he puts in direct charge of the work be required to delay efficient action.

With legislation of this character we may have every confidence that a splendid waterway will be built and be used by our Navy and a great number of ships of commerce and of other navies before the end of the next decade. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, in now renewing my motion to amend, which has been read by the clerk, I have no desire to attempt to amplify the arguments for a lock canal so masterfully presented to the committee by the gentleman from Ohio, whose argument, I trust, has convinced every Member on this floor. I will but call attention again to the fact that the so-called "Spooner Act," authorizing the building of the canal, of June 28, 1902, directs that it shall be supplied with all the necessary locks and other appliances to meet the necessities of vessels passing through the same from ocean to ocean. The very language is conclusive evidence that, in the very origin of this work, it was deemed necessary to provide specifically for the necessity of locks in connection with the canal. The President stated to us in his letter to Congress of February 19, this year, that "in my judgment, the lock canal is advisable," and that he will direct that such a canal be constructed unless Congress directs to the contrary.

The scheme of a lock canal—the lake route—as developed by American engineers, is based on recent American experiences with locks and is the supreme product of the efforts of American engineers. From a business standpoint, it means that this great work can, if built on the lock type, be finished within the next ten years and at a net expense to the Government of at least a hundred millions, and probably two hundred and fifty millions less than the sea-level type of canal.

The problems of the lock canal are theoretically and practically solved. We know exactly, from past experience, how to handle practically nearly every problem with its construction. The lock canal can be built so that ships can pass through it successfully for a definite sum of money, while the problems connected with the sea-level type are unsolved, even in theory, and I believe in practice the undetermined problems in connection with this sea-level type are five times more than those of the lock type of canal, which means an indefinite sum of money and means the expenditure of a vast mass of fortune on a work whose result may, in the end, be questionable.

The sea-level type of canal recommended by the Commission, at a cost of over $100,000,000 more than the lock canal, will not, in my opinon, because of its curvatures, prove satisfactory, even if built, and would probably entail an expenditure of an equal amount of money as would be spent for its first construction, for its improvements, and enlargement, in order to make it feasible to pass ships through of the largest size. The dictates of economy, of the necessity of an early completion of this great waterway, require that Congress at this time should make known its intentions relative to the type under which it should be built.

A lock canal can be built within a definite time for a definite sum of money. A sea-level canal may be built, but within what time and within what expenditures I believe no man knows, for the unusually doubtful and experimental features in connection with the sea-level project are at least five times greater than those connected with the lock type. A declaration now for the building of a lock canal would bring within ten years the realization of our anticipation, while if we attempted to build a sea-level canal, no one within the sound of my voice will see a ship sail through the straits of Panama, but for years we will be fighting with one of the bitterest disappointments, necessitating the enormous expenditure of the people's money to a questionable result. Instead of the strait through Panama, it would result in a narrow tortuous sewer through a mountain range. Business principles and the interest of the United States, and the necessity of the world's commerce demand early completion of this waterway, which will result from a determination at this time to build a lock type of canal, which a thorough knowledge of the situation and careful consideration and weighing of all the evidence determines is a wise solution of this great problem.

A lock canal would be of greater capacity, a better canal, a safer canal, and a canal of quicker passage.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit some calculations as to the cost of the Panama Canal, based on the Statement of Mr. Stevens, the engineer, that it will take about eight years to build a lock canal and about sixteen years to build a sea-level canal, and require the expenditure of about $18,000,000 per annum in either case:

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, in view of the great importance of the question that we are called to vote upon, and the hurry there is, which I fully appreciate, I ask unanimous consent that Members may have leave to print remarks upon this particular question of the Panama Canal within, say, five days.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that general leave should be given in the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think it can be given in the committee. I feel quite sure it can be. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and fully in its control. Its jurisdiction is untrammeled.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule as cited by the parliamentary clerk sustains the point that the Chair made from recollection:

General leave to print may be granted only by the House, although in Committee of the Whole a Member, by unanimous consent, may be given leave to extend his remarks.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That has not been the practice in the House in my recollection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair remembers that it has been the practice. It was only from memory that the Chair made the remark. The gentleman can make his request in the House after the committee rises.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can make the request for myself here.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will do that now, with the understanding that when we go into the House I will ask general leave, so that others may participate in the privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to print remarks on the subject under discussion. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER. I make a like request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to print certain remarks in the RECORD in regard to the isthmian canal. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments close in three minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the effect of the adoption of this amendment will be to appropriate the money, and then the canal will be constructed in part with this appropriation upon the lock type. That is the proposition which the committee is voting upon. I am free to say that I have heard only one side of the case. If compelled to cast a final vote now, I should vote in favor of the lock type with the knowledge that I have at hand. I assume that many Members of the House are in the same predicament. We have heard a very able speech, an hour or more in length, by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] in favor of the lock type of canal. Not one word has been addressed to the House upon the other side of the proposition. Manifestly there are two sides to this question, and it is a very important one. I think, therefore, that the amendment ought to be voted down, in order to give the House more time to deliberate upon the question, so that it may form a just judgment of the case. The House is not in the mood to decide this question this afternoon. The question is pending as a legislative proposition in the other branch of the legislature. It seems to me it would be much better to have it come before the House as a legislative proposition rather than to have it presented to us as a rider upon an appropriation bill. We are not deciding the question for one year or for five years or for ten years, but for the century, and it is extremely important that we shall make no mistake. I am willing to confess that I do not know enough about the question to deal with it justly myself. Many other Members must feel as I do. I hope, therefore, that this amendment will be voted down, in the interest of safe and sane legislation. [Applause.]

Several MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts) there were—ayes 110, noes 36.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase and delivery of material, supplies, and equipment for the construction and engineering and administration departments on the Isthmus of Panama, $9,032,814.24.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 165, at the end of line 2, add: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for materials and supplies to be used in the construction of the canal or in connection therewith except as the result of bids advertised in the manner now established by the Isthmian Canal Commission under existing law."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that. I do not know that it is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserves the point of order.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I will briefly explain the purpose of the amendment. When the gentleman makes the point of order, I will discuss that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make or reserve the point of order?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. TAWNEY. I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Chairman. I do not think it will lie, but I want to have a word to say in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. I renew the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio make the point of order or reserve it?

Mr. KEIFER. I make the point of order. It assumes that it is necessary in and of itself in order that the bids shall proceed. If there is an existing law, then this is unnecessary, but there is no existing law, as I understand it, in regard to the exact thing that is proposed to be required by this amendment.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss the point of order. The amendment relates to the purchase of supplies and materials for use in the construction of the Panama Canal, for which nearly $10,000,000 are about to be appropriated. Under the present law there is no tariff duty levied upon supplies which are received into the Canal Zone to be used in the construction of the canal. The amendment which I have offered simply seeks to secure to the Isthmian Canal Commission the same free system of competition in the purchase of its supplies that it now enjoys. Under the present law there is no discrimination made in favor of American goods. The goods of all countries may enter the Canal Zone duty free if they are to be used in the construction of the canal. Therefore the amendment does not seek to change the law in that respect, but to secure the continued operation of the law. Now, the system that has been adopted——

Mr. LACEY. If the gentleman will allow me, as I heard the amendment read it not only provides that it should be under bids, but bids under existing regulations. It attempts to enact these regulations into statute law by directly recognizing them without defining them.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The amendment is not only in harmony with the law, but with the practice which has been established by the Commission. The Commission now solicits bids for its supplies. They are advertised throughout the United States, and, as a result of competitive bids, awards of contracts are made to the lowest bidders. That is the practice, and this amendment seeks to continue that practice, so the amendment is in harmony with the law and with the existing practice. The Chair will not have to seek far for a precedent to sustain the validity of this amendment. The Chair will only have to consult his own decision a few minutes ago in respect to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York that this is simply a limitation on this appropriation. It does not contemplate a change in the law or any addition to the permanent law. A subsequent Congress may adopt this provision or reject it. It has no force beyond this particular appropriation bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania well says we could deny the appropriation altogether. If this amendment is adopted, then the money will have to be spent in accordance with this provision, but there is no compulsion about it. Not a single dollar need be spent. It is true the Canal Commission, if it intended to buy in the dearest market instead of the cheapest, would be suspended in the air, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggested in his remarks, and that would be the only effect of the amendment in such a case.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, a word upon the point of order. It occurs to me that the point of order raises a question that is pretty close to the line. The rule authorizes amendments on general appropriation bills limiting appropriations. It forbids amendments on appropriation bills that expressly control or limit a discretion vested by law in administrative officers. The question in this case is whether the amendment controls or expressly limits a discretion vested by law in the Canal Commission. It would be competent, of course, to say that the money appropriated should be used in a particular manner, and that would incidentally limit the discretion of the Commission in the expenditure of the particular appropriation. But it might incidentally limit it. Take, for example, the amendment that was up a few moments ago, an amendment providing that no part of the appropriation for continuing the work of constructing the Panama Canal should be available for the construction of a sea-level canal. That incidentally limited the discretion of the Commission and confined the appropriation as a practical proposition to the construction of a lock-level canal; but if the amendment on its face had stated that the money should be used in the construction of a lock-level canal, it would be obnoxious to the rule, because it would control the discretion vested in the President of the United States. This may be a technical distinction, rather a fine one, but it occurs to me that it exists in this case, and that this amendment is probably obnoxious to the rule in the respect that I have pointed out—that it directs and controls not only the appropriation, but expressly limits the discretion of the Panama Canal Commission as well.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which was just agreed to was an amendment limiting and changing the discretion of the Executive; but the limitation was only as to the appropriation carried in this bill, and hence, under the rules of the House, the limitation was in order. Now comes a proposition appropriating a certain amount of money, and the amendment proposed is identically along the same lines as the amendment already agreed to, limiting simply this appropriation—limiting the discretion of the Executive as to this appropriation. So far as the rules are concerned, we could say, after this item, "Provided, That no portion of this money shall be expended for any white vessels, but only for black vessels." It is within the power of the House under the rules to put in any sort of a limitation it pleases, and the amendment only proposes a limitation upon this appropriation, the sum mentioned here, $9,032,814.24. It seems to me that the Chair can not escape from ruling the amendment in order for the same reason that the other amendment was ruled in order. If we can limit the discretion of the Executive as to the kind of a canal he can build with the money we appropriate, then we can limit his discretion as to how he shall buy the material with the money which we appropriate. We do not limit his discretion in any other way or as to any other money, but only as to the money which is appropriated here.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to occupy much time. I think the point of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is quite refined. We are here proposing to limit in no sense the use of the money, because we intend to use it all. We do not say how it shall be used in the sense that we have been limiting other appropriations. What we do say here is that the discretion of the President and others whose duty it is under existing law to expend this money shall be so exercised as that it shall be expended in a certain way. We have a law that vests in the President and in the boards under him the method of expending the money, and it turns out that this amendment is simply new legislation. It is a new mode of expending money in the matter of the construction of the Panama Canal, and in that respect the gentleman who offered the amendment agrees with me, for he made it perfectly clear that the object of his amendment was to provide imperatively how the President and the boards under him shall use this money. So that it becomes absolutely a new law of direction as to the method of expending money in the construction of the Panama Canal and is subject to the objection under Rule XXI.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is only a limitation on the appropriation and not a change of existing law. Every limitation is, in effect, finally a limitation on the discretion of an officer. It is not permitted that this be affirmatively done, but it may be negatively done, and this amendment while not drawn in the usual form, and therefore because of its language making it a somewhat closer question, is yet is substance but a limitation, in the opinion of the Chair, on the appropriation, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I am free to say that I am in favor of the Commission continuing the policy it has heretofore pursued in respect to the purchase of material, supplies, and equipment for the Panama Canal. I am not in favor, however, of adopting an inflexible rule in respect to the purchase of the material and supplies and equipment that will be necessary in the construction of that great enterprise. Up to the present time the Panama Canal Commission has expended $10,666,000 for material, supplies, and equipment. Of that amount all of it was purchased as the result of bids in the open markets of the world, and all of it except $185,000 was purchased in the United States. In other words, foreign manufacturers and foreign producers had the same opportunity to bid that American producers had. Foreign manufacturers had their representatives in this country, who did bid on the various contracts, but, notwithstanding that fact, out of the $10,666,000 that has been expended for that purpose, only $185,000 was expended for foreign material, and $175,000 of that amount was purchased from American concerns dealing in foreign material, leaving only $10,000 expended for foreign material and furnished by foreign concerns. In other words, the American manufacturers are getting the benefit of the trade and the Government of the United States is getting the benefit of the American export price. I do not think it is wise for us to say at this time that this policy shall continue indefinitely. It will continue indefinitely, in my judgment, if Congress says nothing at all about it. I do not believe in our making an inflexible rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question, predicated upon the statement which he has just made. Suppose that they had not been buying these supplies in a market open to the bids of foreign producers as well as the bids of our own producers. Would we, in that event, have succeeded in getting the supplies for the Panama Canal at the competition price? Would not our producers have charged us the home-market price instead of the foreign price?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know as to that, but I will say this to the gentleman——

Mr. WILLIAMS. In other words——

Mr. TAWNEY. Hold on just a minute. I will say this in answer to your question, that if they had not had the benefit of the open market the materials and supplies would have cost the Government more than the Government has paid.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I wanted the gentleman to say. In other words, that as long as we have the open bid to hold over them as a big stick, they give us the benefit of the prices they charge the foreigner instead of exploiting the Government at the prices at which they exploit the American consumer.

Mr. TAWNEY. We have had the benefit of the export price, and I believe we will continue to have that advantage, but I do not see any necessity to now fix a hard and fast rule in respect to the subject of the purchase of material for the canal.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, this is the converse of the proposition with which I think we are all familiar. The Senate lately passed a resolution instructing the President to purchase in the American market all the materials for the construction of the isthmian canal, unless he was asked an unreasonable or extortionate price.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I beg the gentleman's pardon. "Unreasonable and" was the language.

Mr. DALZELL. We will not quible about the word.

Mr. PAYNE. It was "unreasonable or." I am quite positive it is "or."

Mr. DALZELL. The proposition came to this House and went before the Committee on Ways and Means, and has been favorably reported by that committee. That resolution is now on the Calendar, and it will be presented to the House within a few days for its indorsement or rejection. It is, as we believe, an expression of the people of the United States that the American people engaged in the construction of an American enterprise, to be paid for out of the American Treasury, by money collected by way of taxes from the American people, shall be constructed of materials bought in the American market, made by American workmen [applause on the Republican side], and with American competition, and that irrespective of the question as to whether or not by reason of our system our American workmen are paid higher wages and their products command higher prices, if the prices are not unreasonable or extortionate, and I trust the amendment will be voted down. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute for the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers a substitute for the pending amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be used in the purchase of materials, supplies, or equipment of foreign manufacturers when similar articles, the product of American labor, can be purchased at reasonable prices.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "at reasonable prices" and substitute "at the same prices."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to amend the substitute to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "reasonable prices" and insert "at the same prices."

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WANGER. Is an amendment to the original proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. WANGER. Then I move to amend that by striking out the word "existing" and inserting the word "its."

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I make the point of order against that, that you can not twice amend an amendment.

Mr. OLMSTED. But you can perfect the original amendment before voting on the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The original amendment is the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania addressed himself, and which he is now seeking to amend, and it is in order.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I trust the Chair will extricate us from the meshes of this parliamentary situation by having the amendments reported in their final shape.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the original amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts will be reported, the substitute to that proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] and the amendment to that offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN].

Mr. WANGER. I also ask that my amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. By and by we will come to your amendment.

The amendments were reread.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER].

Mr. WANGER. Strike out the word "existing" and insert the word "its;" so as to read:

Isthmian Canal Commission under its law.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question will be on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN].

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I desire to be heard on that proposition.

Mr. PAYNE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I hope that these propositions will be voted down. [Applause.] I am for spending this money, so far as we can do so reasonably, for American goods in constructing this canal. I would like to have every dollar of it spent in that way. The Senate has passed a joint resolution upon this subject, which came over here and has been reported by the Committee on Ways and Means, and which will be brought up before the House for action, and which comprehensively covers this whole question, not for this present appropriation, but for all the money to be spent upon this canal. I want to read the terms of that resolution:

That purchases of material and equipment for use in the construction of the Panama Canal shall be restricted to articles of domestic production and manufacture from the lowest responsible bidder, unless the President shall in any case deem the bids or tenders therefor to be extortionate or unreasonable.

Now, I think that act ought to pass. [Applause.] And it will pass. Why cumber up this bill with any of these amendments? Why not strike them all out? Having passed the Senate, the House will pass it, and it will become a law. I hope these amendments will be voted down.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am utterly opposed to saving money in the cost of this canal at the expense of the American laborer. Every million dollars paid for American locomotives or steam shovels or rails for the Panama Canal or Railroad means $800,000 for American labor, and the same sum paid for foreign supplies of that character means that much American money taken out of this country and paid to laborers in other countries. It is better for all our people that all these millions shall be expended at home and kept in circulation among our own people. But, Mr. Chairman, I realize that any amendment made to this bill can apply only to this single appropriation, and that it will be better to have a general law, permanent in character and applicable to all appropriations and all purchases until the canal is completed, and therefore upon the statement and assurance of my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], a Member of the Committee on Ways and Means, and of the distinguished chairman of that committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], that a satisfactory measure accomplishing the same purpose will be reported from that committee and passed at this session, I withdraw my substitute amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. In the Committee of the Whole an amendment proposed can not be withdrawn except by unanimous consent.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my substitute.

Mr. WILLIAMS. To that I make objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. I move that the debate to the paragraph and amendment thereto be closed in ten minutes.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 96, noes 67.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let us have tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. TAWNEY. How much time does the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] want?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think twenty minutes will be sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers have been ordered; and the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. WILLIAMS, and the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. TAWNEY, will take their places as tellers.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 117, noes 50.

So the motion to limit debate was agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER].

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I suppose we all agree that the materials and supplies for the isthmian canal ought to be secured by competitive bidding. But I take it that whatever propriety there may be in requiring by law that in all cases there shall be such bidding, nobody, not even the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN], will insist that all of the regulations adopted by the Isthmian Canal Commission to this time are perfection, and that there will not be occasion for amendment of the regulations from time to time in the future.

I may only mention one instance, wherein an inadvertent requirement, as I have no doubt it was, cut out American producers and gave a large contract for cement to European manufacturers of that article, to demonstrate the need of amendment. The proposals or invitations for proposals contained the conditions that the cement should be delivered only in certain quantities and at certain intervals upon the Isthmus. Those quantities were less than even full schooner loads. The requirement was that the cement should be delivered by steamer, and the only lines of steamers that went to the Isthmus charged a rate of about $1 per barrel, and for the small shipment permitted a less rate could not be gotten from a sailing vessel, much less from any tramp American steamer.

The steamship lines from the other side of the Atlantic only asked about 55 cents per barrel to the Isthmus, and the difference in the bids was just about the difference in the rates of freight. Now, if that regulation of the Commission did not require shipment by steamer, or did not require delivery in such small quantities and at such frequent intervals, American producers of cement could have underbidden the foreign producers, and American shipping as well as the American manufacturer of cement would have been encouraged, because for full schooner loads an equally low rate would have been given.

The needless conditions in this particular have been changed, but doubtless other conditions will develop from time to time which the Commission should have the power to change.

Mr. TAWNEY. I reserve the balance of my time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GROSVENOR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18442) to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the board of education of the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1291. An act for the relief of James W. Watson.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 12323. An act to extend the public-land laws of the United States to the lands comprised within the limits of the abandoned Fort Crittenden Military Reservation, in the State of Utah; and

H. R. 18668. An act ratifying and confirming soldiers' additional homestead entries heretofore made and allowed upon lands embraced in what was formerly the Columbia Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be notified at the end of three minutes.

Mr. Chairman, we unite with the gentleman from New York, the leader of the majority, in his desire to have only American goods used upon the canal. My amendment will not stop the sale of a single dollar's worth of American goods. To-day, under free competition, without any assistance from any tariff, American manufacturers sell 99 per cent of the canal supplies. The proposition before us is not to substitute foreign for American goods, but to continue the sale of American goods to the United States Government at reasonable prices, such as the export prices of United States manufacturers, and not the extortionate prices which your tariff enables you to collect from your own citizens here in the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, why is the Senate proposition offered? If existing conditions are satisfactory to you gentlemen, why do you wish to change them? What is the purpose of the Senate amendment? It is to enable the men who make American dredges to sell them at exorbitant prices to the Canal Commission and prevent them from buying the Scotch dredges, which they could otherwise buy for thousands of dollars less. It is to compel the Commission to buy American cement at extortionate prices, rather than the low prices they buy it for now in open competition. It is to compel the Commission to buy its iron and steel at the extortionate prices which the steel trust collects in the United States, rather than the reasonable prices which the Canal Commission pays for them now in open competition and which every foreign buyer enjoys.

Now, then, to show what inconsistency there is in your positions even in a single day you vote to adopt the lock type of canal because you say you will save expense. In the same afternoon you propose to fetter the Canal Commission and compel it to pay extortionate prices for supplies, thereby increasing the cost of the canal to the American people. If I had time I would read at length from the testimony produced before our committee. I will read a single line. Mr. Shonts, president of the Canal Commission, said:

> I favor buying in the open market for the reason Mr. Ross, the purchasing agent, has stated, I think, that if we have that privilege it enables us to get our American-made material cheaper. I believe that the steel combination, to illustrate, gives us the benefit of their export prices.

[Applause.]

I think that statement of Mr. Shonts explains the earnest opposition of the able gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. Chairman, not more than 1 per cent of foreign goods is bought now by the Canal Commission. They buy American goods and pay only reasonable prices. The Secretary of War wants existing conditions continued. The president of the Canal Commission wants them continued, in order that they may finish the canal cheaply, and that the American people may not be robbed by the protected manufacturers of the United States. A vote against the amendment which I have offered is a vote to enable the American manufacturers to plunder the American people in the construction of the isthmian canal. A vote for the amendment is a vote to continue the equitable conditions which your Secretary of War, your president of the Commission, and, I believe, the President of the United States wants to continue. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Minnesota has three.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts. The isthmian canal when constructed will not be constructed for the benefit of the United States. It is for the benefit of the world. It is a present which the United States makes to humanity. We have the right, in making that present to mankind, to make it at the lowest possible expense to ourselves. It would be worse than idle for us, in doing this work for humanity, to pay two prices for it. I do not think we are building the Panama Canal for the purpose of putting money into the pockets of the manufacturers of the United States who furnish materials. If we were engaged in that work, it would be better to consume the materials at home, where they would be for our exclusive and special benefit. When we are called upon to expend all the way from one to five hundred millions of dollars—and if a sea-level canal in the end should be adopted, more than that sum, in my opinion—we ought to do it with an eye to economy. The present Canal Commission, under the guidance of the Secretary of War and the President of the United States, has adopted the policy of buying in the markets of the world. Under that policy the United States has obtained 99 per cent or more of the contracts at reasonable prices; but if we can buy more cheaply abroad, let us buy abroad. Who proposes that the canal shall be built by American labor? We take foreign labor because we can get it cheaper. For the same reason we should take the cheapest manufactured products. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I agree with my friend from Illinois that this is largely a gift to the world by the American taxpayers. I want to get what little benefit out of it I can for the American taxpayers, and as far as I can I want to purchase materials which are the result of the labor of American taxpayers, in order that we may do them all the good we are able to do—by using their products in the construction of the canal.

We are taking foreign labor because American laborers do not want to go down there, because the conditions there are not suitable to the American man, and the American can not perform labor there. That is one reason; and the other reason is because the American laborer has more to do at home than he can possibly do. There are not laborers enough to go around.

But I did not rise to discuss the merits of this proposition. As I say, this joint resolution has been reported by the Committee on Ways and Means without any amendment. I hope to get it before this House in a very few days; in fact, I should like to get it before the House to-morrow. Then we will settle this question, and whatever debate there may be upon the merits we will have then; but let us not encumber this bill. Let us vote down all these propositions and put them into permanent law at another time, so that hereafter we shall know just what we are going to do about our expenditures in buying supplies for the building of this canal—from now until the last shovelful of dirt is taken out of the canal. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The first proposition before the House is to perfect the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN]. Therefore, to that end, the first thing in order will be the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to that original amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The next proposition before the House is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who offered a substitute to the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN].

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I thought I withdrew that.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. OLMSTED. I thought I had withdrawn the substitute in favor of the bill, which will be presently reported from the Ways and Means Committee, to more fully accomplish the same purpose——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; it was never withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. There was objection.

Mr. OLMSTED. If I understand the gentleman from Mississippi to be in favor of my substitute, I certainly do not want to withdraw it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, as a partial return to reason, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You ought to have called the other man to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 57, noes 113.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is lost.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers the following amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> And provided further, That the price at which materials or supplies of American manufacture are offered to the Government of the United States is no higher than the price at which the same goods are offered to the residents of foreign nations.

Mr. MANN. I raise the point of order upon that amendment that it is not a limitation at all.

The CHAIRMAN. That involves an examination of the original substitute. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Chair thinks it is clearly in order.

The question is on the amendment to the substitute, which amendment has just been offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. POU was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 28, noes 106.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 65, noes 120.

Mr. WILLIAMS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. TAWNEY.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 59, noes 121.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of officers and employees other than skilled and unskilled labor in the service of the government of the Canal Zone, $600,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not like to impose upon the chairman of the committee. I do not know whether he made any explanation in reference to the form of the Panama Canal items in the bill or not at any other stage of the debate. If he did, I do not want to bother him now.

Mr. TAWNEY. I did not.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in the bill which was passed in the House in January last, making appropriation for canal work, and which subsequently became a law, there was a section I offered as an amendment requiring the Canal Commission to make detailed estimates as far as practicable. I suppose detailed estimates have been made, perhaps more in detail than showed in the bill. I suppose there is some reason to be offered by the committe for not inserting more in detail the items for the canal. I would like to ask the gentleman whether, in the judgment of the committee, it was thought impracticable to insert items in detail in reference to appropriations, and especially in regard to the high-salaried officials of the canal, such as is often done in other cases?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the estimates were submitted in detail, as the gentleman will find from House Public Document 821. This was submitted by the Acting Secretary of the Treasury under date of May 21, 1906.

Now, the Commission submitted their items under eight heads—that is, they lumped their total, segregating the appropriations under eight specific heads. First was for salaries, the officers and employees of the Commission, incidental expenses, pay of the officers here in Washington.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, that under that first item their total estimate was $170,000. I want to say that we did not provide specifically for the office here in Washington, as I know the gentleman from Illinois thinks we ought to have done, and as I thought when the matter was before the House before we would do, for the reason that this force at the present time has reached its maximum. We are assured that the number of employees has reached the maximum and will be reduced from this time on, and that that reduction can be effected more advantageously under a lump appropriation than it can be if we provided specific places with specific salaries. A man knowing that he holds a statutory place with a fixed salary would be more likely to secure influence to aid him in holding that place. In order to enable the Commission to make the reduction which we thought they ought to make, we gave them a lump-sum appropriation. When the force on the Isthmus is fully organized, we can then provide specifically for the force here. It will then be a permanent force. We reduced the estimate for the office force here in Washington about $40,000. If the gentleman will take that document and go through it, he will see why and how we have made the reduction.

Mr. MANN. I have examined the document. I want to make this suggestion: Congress has left the fixing of these salaries wholly to the Executive. The salaries are not fixed by law. That being the case, it seems to me Congress ought to have an opportunity to pass upon these salaries in an appropriation bill, and the only way to do that is to specifically provide for these salaries in the office at Washington in the appropriation bill. I can not see why it would be any great detriment to the service to do so.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I will say that it seems to me strange that the gentleman thinks that as we have intrusted the fixing of the salaries to the President, we ought now to proceed and fix them in an appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For material, supplies, equipment, new buildings, and contingent expenses for account of the government of the Canal Zone, $318,200.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I will read:

Insert in line 18, page 165, after the word "Zone," the following: "Provided, That said materials, supplies, and equipment are bought at prices no higher than the contemporaneous export prices of American manufacturers and producers where the same are known to or can be ascertained by the purchasing board."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 52, noes 108.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, $25,456,575.08: Provided, That all expenditures from the appropriation herein made for the isthmian canal shall be paid from, or reimbursed to the Treasury of the United States out of, the proceeds of the sale of bonds authorized in section 8 of the said act approved June 28, 1902.

Mr. GILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding additional paragraph to section 1, after the word "two," in line 14, page 166, to read as follows:

"That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of public act No. 181, entitled 'An act to authorize the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, through the Bureau of Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries, to cooperate with the shell-fish commissioners of the State of Maryland in making surveys of the natural oyster beds, bars, and rocks in the waters within the State of Maryland,' the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane to the part of the bill to which it is offered. The amendment, as I understand it, relates to the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Mr. GILL. Mr. Chairman, the point of order made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] is not applicable to this amendment as I have presented it here. The amendment is for the purpose of adding an additional paragraph to appropriate the money necessary to carry out the provisions of a law which has been passed by Congress and approved by the President and which provides that the money shall be expended for the purposes provided in that bill. It is therefore perfectly proper as an additional paragraph to this section and within the rules of the House that it shall be offered here.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; I have nothing further to say than it is not germane to this part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it is offered as a new paragraph.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is a part of the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Mr. GILL. It is a new paragraph to section 1. It is not an amendment to any paragraph of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to the opinion that it is in order and not subject to the point of order, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. GILL. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to detain the House for a few minutes, but I have not occupied the time of this body since I have been a Member of it, and I have not objected to the use of time by every other Member of the House. As it is essential that money should be provided to carry out the provisions of a law which this House and the Senate have adopted unanimously and which the President has approved, it seems to me unreasonable on the part of anyone here to object to an appropriation to carry out the provisions of that act. I can not understand why the chairman of this committee could possibly object to this bill unless the money necessary to be expended is already provided for, and if the chairman of the committee can demonstrate to the House that that money has been provided already or is provided by existing legislation, then there is no necessity for the adoption of the amendment, and I shall not press it. If, however, he does object, he ought to demonstrate beyond the possibility of a doubt that that money has been or is provided for by existing appropriations. If he does not demonstrate that, I hope the House will adopt this amendment, and thereby provide the money necessary to carry out the law which it has itself approved of. [Applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman I will say that I was advised this morning by the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey that all that was necessary was to change the language of one of the appropriations in this bill for that service in order to give him authority to expend the money for this work and increase the appropriation to a slight extent, which we will do later on. We can not go back to it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GILL) there were—ayes 56, noes 95.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WATSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 19844—the sundry civil appropriation bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

ALLOTMENT OF LANDS IN BLACKFEET INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 19681) to survey and allot the lands embraced within the limits of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation in the State of Montana, and to open the surplus lands to settlement, together with the statement of the conferees thereon, for printing under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The conference report and statement will be printed under the rule.

SALARIES OF TEACHERS, ETC., IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 18442) to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the board of education of the District of Columbia, together with a statement of the conferees thereon, for printing under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The report and statement will be printed under the rule.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 19264) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, together with the statement of the conferees thereon, for printing under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The report and statement will be printed under the rule.

CONFERENCE REPORT, NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the naval appropriation bill, and move that the House disagree to the conference report in order to make certain changes in the conference report and that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment and ask for a further conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up the conference report on the naval appropriation bill and desires to move that the House disagree to the report, being a partial report—it is a partial report, as the Chair understands.

Mr. FOSS. It is a partial report.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I understand it is simply to correct some error in the report.

Mr. FOSS. It is to correct some provisions agreed to by the House managers, the full effect of which was not understood at the time.

Mr. RIXEY. I want to ask the gentleman this question: There are two or three amendments upon which there will be motions to concur. Now, is the recommittal of this report for the purpose of making any agreement as to matters already disagreed to?

Mr. FOSS. No. The matters which are in disagreement now will be reported in disagreement.

Mr. RIXEY. I give notice now, Mr. Speaker, to the chairman of the committee that I shall ask for a separate vote on the amendment of the Senate as to the battle ship.

Mr. FOSS. Yes; that will be still in disagreement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois to ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the report and the statement in lieu thereof, and to disagree to the report; otherwise the report, as it seems to the Chair, would have to be read or the statement.

Mr. FOSS. I will ask that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments, and ask for a further conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that the House still insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments, and ask for a further conference.

Mr. HULL. A further inquiry: Have we disposed of the conference report yet?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the conference report has been disagreed to.

Mr. HULL. By unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. HULL. Then, Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to amendment No. 4, on page 4 of the printed bill. I do not know what page it is of the bill that is in conference. The Senate struck out some language that was inserted by the House, I think very properly so. The House provision made a double method of computing mileage in this, that it gave a naval officer, whenever he had a short trip, all of his expenses, including his hotel bill, and if he had a long trip he could get 8 cents a mile. Of course, it says it is under the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, but we know how those matters are adjusted. Now the Navy has 8 cents a mile for travel, and after years it has been agreed it was fair compensation. The Army has 7 cents a mile, and after years it has been agreed that that was fair compensation. I am not seeking to change the compensation of either, but I want to protest against any change that does not put them both on an equality, and just as sure as this provision is allowed to stand in the bill it will result in the Army coming in and wanting their expenses in these matters——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman submit any motion or proposition?

Mr. HULL. I move that the House recede and concur in amendment No. 4.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House do recede in the following Senate amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 4: Page 3, line 21, strike out all after "dollars" down to and including "allowed," in line 25.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the text.

The Clerk read as follows:

The words proposed to be stricken out being as follows: "Provided, That hereafter in cases where orders for travel are given to officers of the Navy or the Marine Corps the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, may direct that their mileage or else their actual and necessary expenses only shall be allowed."

Mr. FOSS. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] that he allow us to go to a full conference on this matter, and I say we will bring this back in disagreement if we do not strike it out.

Mr. HULL. What I am afraid of is that the Senate will immediately recede. If they recede, you can not bring it back. You can not prevent them from receding, and they receded with such alacrity this time that I am afraid to risk it again. I have perfect faith in the statement of the gentleman, but the minute the Senate recedes the House conferees are tied up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House do recede from the Senate amendment No. 4 and concur in the same.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, if he insists upon it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. As I understand, this amendment No. 56, pertaining to the battle ship, is to be again reported?

Mr. FOSS. I have so stated to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to ask a separate vote at the proper time on amendment No. 6, and I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if, as the conference now stands, an opportunity will be offered to vote upon that amendment?

Mr. FOSS. Is that the one in regard to the civil-war veterans?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. FOSS. Yes; that will be reported in this agreement.

Mr. PERKINS. Very well. Then there can be a separate vote asked on that?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The motion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] is that the House do further insist on its disagreement to the remaining Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees: Mr. Foss, Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, and Mr. MEYER.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general leave to print on the item of the appropriation bill relating to the Panama Canal may be given for five days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that request to be to print remarks solely upon that question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Solely upon that question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

PUBLIC-LAND LAWS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill H. R. 12323, "An act to extend the public-land laws of the United States to the lands comprised within the limits of the abandoned Fort Crittenden Reservation, in the State of Utah," with Senate amendments.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] moves to nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees: Mr. LACEY, Mr. MONDELL, and Mr. BURNETT.

NATIONAL BANKS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill H. R. 8973, "An act to amend section 5200 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to national banks," with Senate amendments.

Mr. SHARTEL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know something about that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHARTEL] moves that the House do concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some statement about this, in order to know something as to what it is.

Mr. SHARTEL. Mr. Speaker, the Senate amendment changes the House bill from the total amount to be loaned to one firm or individual by national banks from 20 per cent of the capital stock to 30 per cent. The House bill provides that a national bank can loan 10 per cent of its capital and surplus, the total loan in no case to exceed 20 per cent of the capital stock. This amendment changes this item to 30 per cent, and will only affect a very few, not a large number, of national banks.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHARTEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARTLETT. As I understand it, it does this: The bill as it passed the House provided that no one person should receive a loan from one of these banks to exceed 20 per cent of the capital and surplus?

Mr. SHARTEL. Ten per cent.

Mr. DALZELL. Twenty per cent of the capital.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Senate has made it 30 per cent.

Mr. SHARTEL. I will state the whole question for the gentleman's information, which will make it clear. The House passed a bill providing that a national bank might make a loan up to 10 per cent of its capital and 10 per cent of its surplus. Then they put in a general limitation that no loan should be made in excess of 20 per cent of its capital stock. It does not make any difference what the surplus may be. It may be more than 100 per cent. The Senate changed that 20 per cent to 30 per cent.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is what I asked the gentleman.

Mr. SHARTEL. I can illustrate it this way, so as to get the idea clear: The Senate amendment does not affect any bank that has a surplus of an amount less than equal to the capital stock, but there are banks that have a surplus of two or three times the capital stock, and the amount they can loan is 30 per cent of the capital stock.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is, any man may now borrow from a bank upon the capital stock and surplus; and they have changed it from 20 to 30 per cent?

Mr. DALZELL and others. No.

Mr. WANGER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. As I understand it, the Senate committee reported an amendment to the Senate changing the per cent from 20 to 30 per cent. The Senate adopted that amendment to the amendment, and then voted down the proposition. So there is no provision on that subject beyond the primary provision that a loan shall not exceed 10 per cent of the capital and 10 per cent of the surplus.

Mr. SHARTEL. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BATES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question? As I understand this measure, the bill as it passed the House allowed a national bank to loan 10 per cent only of its capital, as it now is, and surplus as well. Now, the Senate amendment provided that at no time shall the loan exceed 20 per cent of its capital. They increased that to 30 per cent of the capital, so that at no time can a loan exceed 30 per cent of the capital.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the House do concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, this amendment of the Senate proposes to authorize the loan of $300,000, say, to any one individual by a bank having a capital of $1,000,000, assuming that it has large enough surplus to allow it to make such a loan. It seems to me that any such provision would be a dangerous thing to the banking interests of the country and to the financial interests of the country. If any one individual is allowed to borrow so large a proportion of the capital stock of any bank, the danger that exists under such conditions would be that if a corporation, firm, or individual making so large a loan found itself in any financial difficulty it or he might fail and bring the bank into bankruptcy. Whereas on the other hand, if only moderate loans are allowed to be made to any one concern, the capital of the bank is distributed among various business enterprises, and the chance is much greater for its continuing to do a legitimate business than under the provisions of this amendment.

Then, too, the security of the depositor is reduced by offering an incentive to bankers to organize new institutions with a small capital and large surplus, thus reducing the liability of the stockholders and making the directors and officers less careful in making loans. If the capital stock is large, the liability of the stockholders offers a better security to the depositor. The greater the liability of bankers to the depositor, the more conservative they are sure to be. Conservatism in our banking institutions should be encouraged. This bill encourages reckless loans, makes the banks less safe, and the stability of the business institutions of the country less secure. Then, too, there is the danger that banks will reduce their capital to evade taxation. Aside from this surplus is always an uncertain quantity. It may be carried on the books when it should be charged off on account of losses. This bill opens the doors to reckless management, to extravagant loans, to evasion of taxation, and to an unwarranted and dangerous reduction in the security heretofore afforded the depositor. It should not pass.

Mr. SHARTEL. The gentleman is entirely mistaken in what he says about the taxation or the national banks evading taxation, as I do not know of any State in the Union in which the surplus of a bank is not taxed the same as its capital stock. My observation is that a large cash surplus in the hands of a bank is much better protection to the depositors than the uncertain and unknown quantity of what might be collected from the stockholders on their liability on the stock. The fact that the stockholders of a bank are willing year after year to allow their earnings to remain in the bank as a surplus account is one of the best evidences of good management and the thorough solvency of the institution.

This bill only places the national banks in line and in shape to take care of the conservative business of the country and, in my opinion, it has no tendency whatever to make dangerous banking in any manner.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHARTEL. I would like to state this proposition, which does not seem to be understood, then I will answer a question.

Mr. Speaker, the present national banking law allows a national bank to loan 10 per cent of its capital stock to one person, firm, or corporation. The bill of the House, as it passed the House, provided that a national bank could loan to one person, firm, or corporation, 10 per cent of its surplus in addition to 10 per cent of its capital. This amount was limited in this way, providing that no loan of this kind should exceed in amount 20 per cent of the original capital stock. The Senate amended the bill by striking out the word "twenty" and inserting the word "thirty," so that no loan under any circumstances, under the Senate amendment, can exceed 30 per cent of the capital stock.

Mr. PAYNE. And then only in case the surplus is equal in amount to its capital stock and more.

Mr. SHARTEL. Yes. A bank having $100,000 capital and $100,000 surplus, under the bill as amended by the Senate could only loan $20,000, or an amount equal to 20 per cent of the capital stock, to one firm or individual.

Mr. MADDEN. Under the present law they can only loan 10 per cent.

Mr. SHARTEL. They can only loan 10 per cent, no matter how large a surplus they have. Now, a bank having $100,000 capital and $400,000 surplus could, under the Senate amendment, loan the original $10,000 on the capital stock and $20,000 on the surplus, which would be $30,000 instead of $20,000, the limit in the House bill. I think the amendment is a good one. It does not endanger the banking business in the least, and is only in the interest of good business for the banks and the people.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman submit to a question?

Mr. SHARTEL. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. Is not the effect of this to encourage small capitalization and a large surplus, so as to avoid assessment liability on stock in case of the failure of a bank?

Mr. SHARTEL. No; I think not.

Mr. PADGETT. Why not? You may loan the surplus, and there is no assessment liability on surplus. There is an assessment liability upon stock, so that there would be an encouragement to avoid stock liability and to organize a bank upon small capital and with a large surplus.

Mr. OLMSTED. As long as the bank has a big surplus there will not be any assessment.

Mr. PADGETT. But if the bank failed there would be a small individual liability.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the bill you originally introduced you did not have any limitation whatsoever on the 10 per cent loan of the surplus; but afterwards you put in a proviso limiting it to a total of 20 per cent of the capital, and that 20 per cent was for the express purpose so that banks would not have an inducement to diminish their capital stock at the expense of their surplus and avoid taxation in some States and in others avoid the double liability to which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] has referred. And was not that proviso put in at the request of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], who stated that he would oppose the bill unless such a limit was put there? And now you are raising it 10 per cent more.

Mr. SHARTEL. The gentleman's statement is partly correct and partly incorrect. There was no mention made of any certain limitation, but it was thought best by the Committee on Banking and Currency to put in some limitation for the reasons that have been stated. This Senate amendment would not, I believe, affect fifty banks in the United States. I doubt if there are more than fifty banks in this country that have three times as much surplus as capital. The bill relieves the situation as far as between five and six thousand national banks are concerned in the United States. This increase to 30 per cent is a matter of very little importance, because the bank must have twice as much surplus as capital before the limitation would apply.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are there not many banks in large cities that have a great deal more surplus than capital? For instance, the Chemical National Bank in New York City.

Mr. SHARTEL. Very few.

Mr. STAFFORD. And banks in Pittsburg and Chicago and many other cities.

Mr. SHARTEL. Not many. I think fifty will cover the whole number.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that there are very few banks now that have twice as much surplus as capital stock; but if they are encouraged to increase their surplus while they decrease their capital stock to avoid liability of the stockholders, the double liability which exists in some States, I am afraid that it will not be long before there will be a good many banks with double as much surplus as capital stock. It seems to me this will encourage them to have double as much surplus as stock. The gentleman must keep in mind that the stockholders of the bank are liable for 100 per cent of their stock—that is, they have a double liability, and as far as they can operate on the basis of their stock they are limited by their personal double liability. But if they are encouraged to decrease the stock and increase the surplus, they are encouraged to do an unsafe business. It seems to me that this is rather an important question to take up now, and I would suggest that gentlemen let it go over until the Members of the House have time to examine and think about it.

Mr. SHARTEL. In answer to the gentleman, I want to say that from practical experience I do not think there is any better evidence of a good bank than one that is building up a large surplus. Whenever the stockholders of a bank are willing year after year to let their earnings remain in the bank, it shows their absolute confidence in the stability of the institution. I will say further it has been the policy of the Government to encourage the building up of a good strong surplus.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is not that true where there is no object to build up a surplus—where they do not exempt them from liability in building up the surplus? I suggest the matter go over until the House can have time to think about it.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SHARTEL. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Would it not be possible under the plan proposed to have a new bank organized with $50,000 capital and $100,000 surplus, whereas if the law was not in force they would organize a bank with $100,000 and $50,000 surplus?

Mr. SHARTEL. No; I do not think that would occur. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN) there were—ayes 125, noes 70.

Mr. MADDEN. I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays. All those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise. [After counting.] Fourteen gentlemen have arisen; not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused. The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SHARTEL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CUSTOMS COLLECTIONS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following cablegram; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Philippines:

MANILA, June 16, 1906.

UNITED STATES SENATE, Washington:

Undersigned respectfully express hope that Senate bill attempting ratification collections Philippine customs prior to March 8, 1902, will not be enacted, and urge Congress to do utmost to expedite appropriations for judgments following test case of Warner, Barnes & Co. Besides benefit to large number of native Filipino claimants, prompt payment of claims of British, Swiss, German, and other claimants, who were former bankers of native agriculturists, will enable such merchants to partially resume accustomed advances on future crops, thereby materially relieving agricultural depression caused by long existing and increasing financial stringency. Furthermore, present taxes, although necessary, are admittedly burdensome on merchants, especially after careful consideration. Our earnest conviction is that prompt refund will materially relieve present financial crisis, thereby substantially benefiting Filipino people throughout the islands.

T. H. PARDO DE TAVERA,
Commissioner (and others).

WHEELING, W. VA., June 15, 1906.

Hon. N. B. SCOTT, Washington, D. C.:

We hope you will exercise your influence against the pipe-line amendment to the rate bill. It should be entirely eliminated. It is not practicable, and will do great harm to producers of oil and natural gas if adopted.

GEO. HURD, President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The telegrams sent to the desk by the Senator from West Virginia will be appropriately referred.

EXTENSION OF PUBLIC-LAND LAWS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12323) to extend the public-land laws of the United States to the lands comprised within the limits of the abandoned Fort Crittenden Military Reservation, in the State of Utah, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference, and that the Chair be authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. HANSBROUGH, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. MCLAURIN.

TIMBER ON MENOMINEE INDIAN LANDS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13372) to authorize the sale of timber on certain of the lands reserved for the use of the Menominee tribe of Indians, in the State of Wisconsin, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. CLAPP, and Mr. DUBOIS.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. C. R. MCKENNEY, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 19264) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907; and it was thereupon signed by the Presiding Officer.

LAKE ERIE AND OHIO RIVER SHIP CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14396) to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, to define the powers thereof, and to facilitate interstate commerce.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, the bill before the Senate introduces a new departure on the part of the Government in dealing with common carriers. An examination of the statutes shows that never before has Congress granted a charter to a company for the construction of a canal, ship or other kind, within the United States, and Congress has never granted a charter toa railroad company, except as in the case of the Union Pacific and its branches, to accomplish a distinct and essentially national end. This measure but grants to a proposed common carrier the right to do business in the United States, and to construct, own, and operate the agency through which the business will be done.

When the reason for such a departure was asked for, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] was referred to a pamphlet, to which reference has been made a number of times, and told he would find it set forth in that.

This is the reason the pamphlet sets forth:

> The committee went a step further, realizing that this canal was but a short connecting link between the waterway systems of the Great Lakes and the Ohio and Mississippi rivers under the control of the Federal Government, which would sooner or later be taken over by the Government and made a part of the Federal waterway system, even if primarily built by a private corporation, introduced a bill in Congress asking for power under a national charter to a corporation to build this canal.
> This bill asks for no Government aid or appropriation, but does provide that its plans and works before construction is begun shall be approved by the Secretary of War, so that when taken over by the Government it will have a canal approved by the Government engineers, the same as if it was built primarily by the Government.

So the only reason given for seeking a Federal charter to enable a private corporation to construct, own, and operate a canal is that there is a probability that at sometime in the future the Government itself may conclude to own and operate it.

I am very glad that the proposition comes from Pennsylvania and from the city of Pittsburg, through the two able Senators from Pennsylvania. It is a strange but very appropriate agency with which to familiarize the people of the country with ultimate government ownership of these great public-service utilities. When Congress passes this bill, as it doubtless will, it will announce to the country that the reason it was moved to do so was to make it easy for the Government to some day own it itself and to operate it for the benefit of the commerce of the country.

There is not a very long stride, Mr. President, between government ownership of such canals and government ownership of railways. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] yesterday admitted that under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States the Government might construct railways on its own account and take over, own, and operate the railways of the country.

The people are becoming more and more familiarized with the proposition that the Government ought to own and operate for the common good the country's railways, and when Congress grants a charter to a private corporation that authorizes the construction of 200 miles of canal by a private company for the avowed reason that ultimately the United States will take it over and operate it for the common benefit quite a step has been taken toward the ultimate ownership and operation by the Government of all these utilities.

Mr. President, I would not object to the bill for that reason. There are a great many Senators, however, who would. If the proposition for this canal had come to Congress from the West—from Kansas, Nebraska, or the Dakotas, for example—I believe it would have met with the solid opposition of most of the Senators who are now ranged up in its favor.

The intended exercise of its power by Congress in this case is the more marked in view of the fact that this company have already, through the legislatures of both Pennsylvania and Ohio, secured charters for the construction of this identical work. Before they came to Congress their agents visited Columbus and Harrisburg, and through their efforts bills were passed which authorized the organization of this corporation, the construction of the canal, and its operation for the benefit of its owners.

Then, Mr. President, why should the men behind the proposed corporation come to Congress and ask for a charter to do that for which they already have a charter? The reason they give is that ultimately the Government will become its owner, wherefore it is desirable that the plan should be approved by the Secretary of War.

But, Mr. President, I doubt if that is the reason. I do not know that Pittsburg has citizens more patriotic and self-sacrificing than are the citizens of other cities. I am inclined to the belief that there is some other reason which sends these men to Congress to induce the Government to put its stamp of approval upon the enterprise, and I think that that reason is a financial one.

A careful inspection of the bill discloses that it is in reality a jungle. I suppose I ought to offer apologies to Upton Sinclair for using the term. If one will penetrate the jungle he will find a wild cat. If Senators desire to go wild-catting in the jungle of this bill, they will find the animal.

Again, I suggest that if Senators from the West asked this body for a charter such as this, with the wildly loose provisions it contains for the promotion of the enterprise, the proposition would be frowned or laughed out of the body.

I think it may be accepted that millionaires from Pittsburg would not be willing to put money into any enterprise upon any other basis than that of four to one. The United States Steel Company is a sample of the financiering that they have done along this line.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PATTERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. KNOX. Does the Senator know anything which will substantiate that statement, beyond the fact that the people of Pittsburg managed to sell to the people of New York steel works for three or four times what they were worth?

Mr. PATTERSON. Does not that establish what I stated?

Mr. KNOX. It does not establish that the people of Pittsburg created the United States Steel Corporation, and bought their own property at three or four times what it was worth. The facts are, as I understand them (and I know nothing about it except what I read in the newspapers), that an eminent financier in the city of New York conceived the idea of buying the steel properties of the United States, and the people of Pittsburg were not foolish enough to take for them any less than they could get.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I do not admit the legitimacy of the defense interposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I am inclined to think that the millionaires and multimillionaires of Pittsburg were particeps criminis with the great financiers of New York. Can the Senator from Pennsylvania tell us where the United States steel conspiracy originated?

Mr. KNOX. No.

Mr. PATTERSON. But one thing is certain, Pittsburg millionaires were the principal beneficiaries of the scheme, and they, with those in New York, succeeded in selling to the country—practically to the country—about $250,000,000 worth of real property for a billion dollars, $750,000,000 representing wind and nothing more. Yet more substantial than wind, Mr. President, was the power given to this company through the high tariff and the monopoly they secured under its wings to exploit the country and extort profits upon a billion-dollar capitalization with but a quarter of a billion of real capital invested.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PATTERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. KNOX. There are 600,000 people in greater Pittsburg, and I think there is not one of them who is in any way connected with any manufacturing establishment which sold out to the United States Steel Company. Therefore, there is nothing in that argument unless you establish the identity of the individuals.

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh, everybody knows that the great mass of a community are never the beneficiary of such disreputable financial transactions. The trouble about it is that there are but few beneficiaries, while the people of the country are compelled to pay the freight. I alluded to the United States Steel Company for the purpose of establishing what I suggested, that the millionaires of Pittsburg are quite unwilling to make investments in these days of vast enterprise and immense profits that will yield them less than four to one on the investment, and I think I can demonstrate from this bill that that is precisely what is proposed, and it is to just such a vast scheme of overcapitalization that Congress is asked to give its approval.

Whatever good things may be in the bill, there are certain things very important to an honest enterprise that are not in the bill. The capitalization of the company is not fixed. That is left to the uncertainties of construction. The interest to be paid upon the bonds is not mentioned. The price at which the bonds and stock of the company may be sold is not even suggested; so that promoters of this enterprise—and I do not doubt that the promoters have already arranged it—may, before a pick is struck or a single square yard of earth removed, place the stock and bonds of this company upon the market and buy them all themselves at whatever price they may fix for them. If there is anything in this measure that limits the price for which either the stock or the bonds may be sold, I will cheerfully give way either to the Senator from Pennsylvania or to the Senator from Minnesota to point it out.

Mr. President, according to the pamphlet to which reference has been made, at least two or three years ago $33,000,000 was the avowed and accepted cost of this enterprise. I will read from the pamphlet an article copied from the Pittsburg Post of December 3, 1904. The printing of that article in this pamphlet is a guaranty that in the opinion of the promoters of this canal its statements may be relied upon. I read from the article:

> I am informed that the new corporation is to be formed under the existing State charters granted the canal, and this step will be taken simply because of the desire to hasten action, so that when the national charter is granted by Congress much of the preliminaries will have been accomplished. Regarding the financing of the company, while its cost of $33,000,000 may seem a big sum, you know that Pittsburg can supply the money for twice that sum if shown that the canal will be a sound investment. In fact, I understand that some encouraging assurances have already been given on the financial end.

I supplement that with an extract from the speech of Mr. John E. Shaw, printed in the same pamphlet. It is as follows:

> That modern waterway engineering has become a very exact science is shown by the fact that the Kiel Ship Canal in Germany, lately opened for traffic, was estimated to cost $39,000,000, Prussia agreeing to contribute $12,500,000, the remaining $25,500,000 to be paid out of the imperial exchequer.
> The actual cost was $37,290,720. It is 61 miles long; 30 feet deep; bottom width, 72 feet; surface width, 216 feet.
> This canal can fairly be compared with ours as to cost, as it is one-half the length, but twice the size.

So the Kiel Canal, held up for comparison in the matter of cost with that of the proposed canal, demonstrates that $37,000,000 should be about the cost of the proposed canal.

But the Senator from Pennsylvania has suggested that the cost of material and labor have advanced since this pamphlet was prepared, about two years ago. Not so very much, Mr. President; but let us admit, for the sake of demonstration, that there has been a very considerable advance in the cost of canal material and construction, and add for it to the $33,000,000, the estimated cost two years ago, the sum of $17,000,000, and make the cost $50,000,000. Surely that is a generous allowance for the item of increased cost. I intend to make the comparisons I have in mind upon the theory that this immense sum—$50,000,000—will be required to place this canal in good working and business operation.

Then, Mr. President, what is there on the other side of the ledger? Fifty million dollars for construction and completion upon the one side, and $400,000 per mile of bonds to the extent of the proposed mileage and $400,000 per mile in stocks to the extent of the proposed mileage upon the other. The proposed mileage, according to the Senator from Pennsylvania, is somewhere in the neighborhood of 225 miles. One hundred and fifty miles was the estimate given by him the other day for the main branch, and he estimated the two branches or laterals at about 75 miles additional.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONG in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PATTERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. KNOX. I wish to correct that statement, and the correction is very much in favor of your argument. The distance is 122 miles. When I stated that it was about 150 miles I was figuring upon the canal going from Pittsburg, or the immediate vicinity of Pittsburg, to Ashtabula. But the Ohio River runs north, almost northwest, and that shortens the distance. Taking it from the point in Ohio to the mouth of the Beaver, it shortens the distance to about 122 miles, exclusive of the feeders. I can not give you a definite statement as to what the length of those feeders will be. No one could do that.

Mr. PATTERSON. Then, Mr. President, let us take the statement that was made by the Senator from Pennsylvania as to his understanding of the length of the feeders, about 75 miles.

Mr. KNOX. Not to exceed that.

Mr. PATTERSON. That will make a canal with feeders about 200 miles in length, and at $800,000 per mile, one half in bonds and the other half in stock, the sum will be $160,000,000.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield further to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PATTERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. KNOX. I know the Senator does not want to be inaccurate.

Mr. PATTERSON. No; I do not.

Mr. KNOX. Therefore I want to call his attention to the fact that there is nothing in the bill which provides that the stock shall be $400,000 a mile and that the bonds shall be $400,000 a mile. The provision of the bill is that the stock or bonds shall in no case exceed that amount, and that they shall not be issued in any amount except on the actual cost of the work.

Mr. PATTERSON. The first statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania is correct, but the latter statement is inaccurate. I will read the very language of the bill for the purpose of showing, as I think I will be able to show, that the statement of the Senator is inaccurate.

So we have, Mr. President, $160,000,000 of liabilities in the way of bonds and stock that may be issued upon the basis of the canal and feeders, lines 200 miles in length. The question is, Is there any limitation in this bill upon the amount of the bonds and the stock that can be issued within $800,000 per mile? In the first place, both the bonds and the stock may be issued immediately. The bonds and the stock may be issued before knowledge of what the cost of the work will be; and there is certainly no limitation in the bill as to the time for the issuance of either the one or the other of those securities. If that is the case, who is to determine what these bonds and stocks shall be sold at, or how much of them shall be issued? Certainly Congress exercises no supervisory power. The junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] offered an amendment which if adopted would give supervision over the expenditure by the Interstate Commerce Commission, but with that or some other similar provision absent from the bill there is positively no supervisory power by Congress or anybody else, except it be by the board of directors, as to the time when or the price at which these securities shall be marketed.

I feel, Mr. President, that the whole plan is perfected. I do not know whether or not those whose names are mentioned in the bill are what are termed—I will simply use the term to express what is in my mind, without intending to be offensive—"dummies." I do not know whether they are the men, or whether any of them are the men, who are to supply the funds for the construction of this canal, but I have no question that the arrangements are all made, that the understanding is complete, and that when this bill becomes a law the plans which have been made will be promptly put into effect. I do not know—perhaps the Senator from Pennsylvania does—whether the men behind this enterprise are the United States Steel Company, and their purpose is to get connection with the iron-ore fields of the Lakes, so that their product may be transported to their works in and around Pittsburg more cheaply than it can be gotten there now, and so that their finished product can be produced at a much less cost, while they will be enabled, through the monopoly they hold under the protecting ægis of the tariff, to continue to sell that product at the same high price they now command. I have no doubt but that an arrangement is already made by this monopoly to take the bonds and the stock, and I have no doubt, either, that the whole sum that will go into the enterprise will be but a sufficient amount to construct the work, and that and all the rest of the $160,000,000 will stand as a lien upon the enterprise, a lien that will enable the owners, Mr. President, to exact unjust and unfair rates from those outside of the trust who must use the canal, and that will enable them to secure from the Government, when the time of purchase may come, a price three or four times beyond what its cost was to them.

Mr. President, am I right in the statement that there is no limitation whatever upon the price for which the securities shall be sold? Turning to section 3, we find this provision:

> SEC. 3. That the capital stock of the company shall not exceed $400,000 per mile of canal proposed to be constructed—

Not of canal constructed, but of "canal proposed to be constructed," in the neighborhood of 200 miles—> and that the bonded indebtedness authorized by this act shall not exceed $400,000 per mile of canal proposed to be constructed, so that the sum total of stock issued and bonded debt created shall not exceed $500,000 per mile of canal proposed to be constructed.

So that the capital stock is determined before the construction and the amount of bonds and stock are determined before construction. The right to place these upon the market and to sell them goes with the proposition that it may all be done before construction. Is there any room to doubt but that those who have arranged to finance this enterprise, who will own it, and for the direct benefit of whose business interests it is to be constructed, will arrange so that this $50,000,000 enterprise will be held by them with stock and bonds to the amount of $160,000,000 encumbering it?

Mr. President, there are provisos in this section, the true meaning of which I doubt if the Senators supporting the measure have apprehended. I make the statement without intending any reflection—for that would be something I could not contemplate for a moment—upon the intelligence of Senators. But, judging from the statements made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, if my construction of this proviso is right, I feel that he does not really understand its meaning. Following the part of section 3 to which I called attention is this proviso:

Provided, however, That the amount of debt created by the issue of bonds shall in no case exceed the amount of stock subscribed for and paid in in money, or property at its fair value.

A limitation—"at its fair value." That applies to property. Mr. President, the Senator will not claim, I think, that that proviso requires that the stock shall be sold and paid for at par. If he does not, then there is no guard whatever in the measure as to the price to be paid for the stock. If it does not provide that the stock is to be paid for at par, then it can only mean that it may be bought at whatever price those who have fathered this enterprise may see fit to fix upon it.

Now, with stock issued to the extent of $400,000 per mile of the canal proposed to be constructed, with such price as these promoters shall see fit to give or pay for that stock, then bonds may be issued up to the amount of the stock—the face value of the stock—not limited in amount to the price that is paid for the stock. The bonds may be sold for whatever the promoters may see fit to fix. So that when we read this proviso, to which I have called attention—and I will read it again—we may ask what limitation or what protection that affords either to the Government or to the people, to those who will use the canal?

Provided, however, That the amount of debt created by the issue of bonds shall in no case exceed the amount of stock subscribed for and paid in in money, or property at its fair value.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. Is it the position of the Senator from Colorado that a provision limiting the amount of the debt to "the amount of stock subscribed for and paid in in money or property at its fair value" means other than that it must be fully paid in?

Mr. PATTERSON. What I contend for is this: It does not mean that the stock shall be paid for at its face or its par value.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I think that is what it does mean, and thinking that, I would not have the slightest objection to words being put into this bill which would indicate it. To show that the promoters of this enterprise thought that is what it meant, if the Senator will examine this bill, he will find that the proviso originally read that—

The amount of debt created by the issue of bonds shall in no case exceed the amount of stock subscribed for and fully paid in in cash and bona fide expended in the promotion, maintenance, and construction of said canals and works.

Mr. PATTERSON. "The amount of stock subscribed for and fully paid in" would not meet the requirement.

Mr. KNOX. Well, then, I do not understand the Senator's position.

Mr. PATTERSON. If the Senator would provide, so far as this particular feature of the section is concerned, that "the amount of stock subscribed for at its par or face value shall be paid for in money," then, so far as the stock is concerned, it could not be issued under the law for anything less than its face. Any provision short of that would not meet the proposition that I have contended for. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania state that, so far as this is concerned, he is willing to have the language referred to amended?

Mr. KNOX. As I have previously stated, I have no more control over this bill than has the Senator from Colorado, and I speak simply from my personal standpoint. I never saw this bill until it came over from the House of Representatives, and know nothing about it nor any more about those who are back of it than does the Senator from Colorado, except that I know, from the names of these gentlemen, that they are high-class men, and are acting in absolute good faith.

I am perfectly willing now—to answer specifically the Senator's question—so far as my vote is concerned, to vote to provide that the stock shall be paid for at its par value in money or in property at its fair value.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator from Pennsylvania is willing to permit a certain amendment to be made—the amendment that I suggested—which would meet the criticism that I was making; but he is only willing to accept it so far as his individual vote is concerned.

Mr. KNOX. That is the only power I have.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator realizes, I think, that there is a wide difference between the two propositions. Unless the price at which the stock is to be sold is distinctly stated, the stock can be sold at whatever sum the promoters of this enterprise may see fit to fix for it.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator understand that stock corporations can lawfully dispose of stock at less than its par value, so as to release subscribers from their liability for the par of the stock? Is not the contrary true, except in cases where it is provided by law that stock may be sold for less than its par value?

Mr. PATTERSON. I have no knowledge, Mr. President, of any law of Congress that prohibits any transaction of that kind.

Mr. SPOONER. But is not that the general principle?

Mr. PATTERSON. Not at all. The markets are flooded with stocks that are sold at all the way from a quarter of a cent a share up to the par value, and other kinds of stock in enterprises of every kind and character. Unless you find upon the statute books of some of the States a provision that makes it impossible to do so, there is nothing to prevent stock being placed upon the market at whatever price either the company or the holders of the stock may see fit to fix.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I have had some knowledge of corporation affairs, and I have never yet known a case where the stock of a corporation was sold for less than its par value unless there was statutory authority to that effect; indeed, the only stocks of that character that I know anything about are the wild-cat Colorado mining stocks.

Mr. PATTERSON. Well, Mr. President, I am now talking about Pittsburg wild-cat canal stocks. If the mining stocks of the West are subject to the name that has been given to some of them—and some of them richly deserve it—when the features of this bill are clearly understood, the name is just as applicable to the stocks of this enterprise, although there may be a thousand million dollars behind it and within forty-eight hours after this bill becomes a law they may commence the construction of the canal under this authority. I do not hesitate, Mr. President, to denounce any scheme, especially when it is to be a transportation scheme, an interstate transportation scheme, a scheme whose profits are made through tolls exacted from the people—whose amount of tolls is to be largely determined by the face value of its liabilities represented in its stocks and bonds—I do not hesitate to denounce any such scheme that will impose liabilities upon the completed work that amount to four times the cost of its construction as a wild-cat scheme of the wildest character.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PATTERSON. With great pleasure.

Mr. MALLORY. I notice the Senator dwells upon the fact that the canal company is to be allowed to issue stock that may be sold at less than its par value. Just above that portion of the bill to which the Senator has referred is the following proviso:

Provided, however, That the amount of debt created by the issue of bonds shall in no case exceed, etc.

Does that mean bonds sold at their par value?

Mr. PATTERSON. I think not.

Mr. MALLORY. Why, then, should not the amendment which the Senator suggests for the regulation of the stock also apply to the bonds? Why does not the Senator suggest an amendment that the bonds shall be sold at par as well as the stock?

Mr. PATTERSON. I was coming to that a little later on. If the Senator from Pennsylvania had agreed to the amendment that I suggested that the stock should be subscribed and paid for at its face or par value, I was then going to suggest that even that would place no limitation or restriction upon the price for which the bonds may be disposed of.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. The Senator from Colorado must have misunderstood me. I said so far as I was personally concerned I could see no objection to that suggestion.

Mr. PATTERSON. Well, Mr. President, let us, for the sake of the argument, accept the amendment that the stock shall be subscribed and paid for at its par value. Then the bonds may be sold at any sum whatever, for the amount of the bonds—that is, the sum of the bonds—is to be determined by the amount in shares of the stock at its par value, and there is no proposition contained in this measure that will require the bonds to be sold at their face value, or at 50 per cent of their value or 10 per cent of their value. Even with the amendment to which the Senator from Pennsylvania says he can see no objection, if that is adopted, to prevent wild-catting through the agency of the bonds, a like amendment must be made to that part of the proviso that relates to bonds.

When that is done, Mr. President, what safeguard is there as to the amount that will be actually paid for the construction of this work? I am analyzing this bill from the standpoint of a Western Senator who, if he introduced a measure of this kind, would be compelled to meet the criticisms of the Senators from the East. What safeguard is there against twice the real value of this work being paid for it?

I have little doubt but that the promoters of this scheme, those who will constitute the company and hold the stock and bonds, will be the construction company. There is no provision that this work shall be done by contract let on fair competition. There is nothing in it to prevent the owners of the stocks and bonds, whatever price they may pay for them, organizing themselves into a construction company—indeed, it would do violence to common experience if we did not know that something of the kind would be done, and that those doing it would pay themselves a sum for the work that is far in excess of its value. So, though the promoters should be required to subscribe for the stock at its par value, and then they should arrange to take the bonds at much below their face value, through the agency of the construction company they could get every dollar back except the sum which would be necessary for the construction of the work.

It is by reason, Mr. President, of these fatal omissions in the measure that the amendment of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is so appropriate and should be adopted. If this scheme is to have the brand of the Government upon it, if the securities of this canal company are to go upon the market after they pass from the hands of the first owners to sell at par and to be received as gilt-edged, some amendment should be attached to the bill that will give to the Government accurate knowledge of the cost of the canal, not only as to the character of the work, but as to its cost, so that when rates and tolls are fixed, or when the Government comes to buy and pay for it, the rates and tolls will not be enormously beyond what are fair and just, and the cost to the Government will not be three or four times the cost of the canal.

If the Government is to put its stamp of approval on this enterprise, why should it not be constructed, in a measure at least, under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission? Why should not the estimates for the work be filed with it? Why should not accounts of the cost of the work and accounts of the sums paid for it be filed from time to time with the Interstate Commerce Commission?

During the debate on the rate bill I heard a number of Senators declare that some method for the appraisement of the value of the property of all common carriers should be adopted, so that the real cost of the property might enter into the determination of the rates and tolls to be allowed. The proposition met the approval and appealed to the sound judgment of most of the Senators, though no amendment was adopted putting the proposition into effect. But here is a new departure; here is a transportation proposition that, outside of the great transcontinental railways, has never before received the indorsement of the Government. A charter is demanded from the General Government. If the Government is to put its stamp of approval upon the enterprise, then good faith to the people and investors of the country as well as to its shippers requires that the Government should exercise reasonable supervision over the amount of money that will be expended upon it. There should be some degree of certainty that when the stock and bonds are in the hands of innocent holders they will represent approximately the real value of the work.

Unless something of this kind is done the Government is making itself a party not only to a possible, but to a probable, fraud. When I use the word "fraud" I mean a fraud practiced upon shippers by reason of freight charges they will be compelled to pay, based upon the enormous amount of dishonest liabilities to be attached to this canal. What the rate of interest upon the bonds will be, who can tell—6 per cent, 7 per cent, 5 per cent? What the dividends that may be demanded will be who can tell? But they will all be based upon a stock and bond issue up to the full possibility of this measure. That means freight charges at least two or three times beyond what they should be; and when the Government comes to take over this property it means that the price to be paid will be three or four times in excess of what it cost.

I suppose, Mr. President, as has been suggested, that the bill will become a law. I can hardly conceive of any bill which would be fathered so earnestly and zealously as this is by the Senators from Pennsylvania that would not receive the vote of the majority of this Chamber, but I unite with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] in protesting against such a measure as this, whatever safeguards it might provide for fair and honest construction. I protest against it because it is a departure from what hitherto has been the fixed and settled policy of the Government; I protest against it because it is the initial step for the nationalization of the property of common carriers; I protest against it because it will stand as a precedent for the granting of charters, not only to canal companies, but to railway companies, and after a while there will be charters granted without many of the safeguards that are found in this bill.

As this class of legislation expands, as such measures multiply, as railways and canals are put in operation under Federal authority, we will find the power, the dignity, and the usefulness of the States departing.

Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether any of these incorporators are from any other State than Pennsylvania or from any other city than Pittsburg?

Mr. KNOX. I am unable to answer the question. I said a few minutes ago I never saw this bill until it passed the House, and while I know personally probably half of the people whose names appear upon the face of the bill, the others I do not know. Those, however, whom I do know are either from Pittsburg or that vicinity, but not all living in the city itself. That is as nearly as I can answer the Senator's question.

Mr. PATTERSON. Are there any millionaires among them?

Mr. KNOX. I think that is rather a peculiar question, but answering from my own impression of the standing of these gentlemen——

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. KNOX. I shall answer the question, now that it has been propounded. I see one name here, that of a very prominent merchant, a gentleman who has made a considerable fortune as a dry goods merchant, who I presume is a millionaire. Outside of him I do not notice the name of any man whom I should designate a millionaire.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will not occupy the time of the Senate any longer. My purpose was to call the attention of the Senate to the extraordinary omissions in this bill; to the opportunities that it gives for wild-cat promotion; to the paltry reason that the company offers for ignoring the charters given to it by the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio; and to make the suggestion that I have as to the men who are really behind the enterprise. Of course I understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania is simply representing his constituency in promoting the passage of the bill. I have called attention to the paltry reason that is given for seeking a Federal charter, and to suggest that, in my own opinion, it is not an honest one. It is not the reason given by the Senators from Pennsylvania or either of them, or by the Senator from Minnesota, who has reported the bill from the committee and is in reality in charge of it.

I suggest that it is not an honest reason. I do not claim to have any greater knowledge upon the subject than any other Senator. But the reason given bears the impress of insincerity upon its face. The idea that Pittsburg millionaires would seek a Federal charter simply because they expect in fifty or a hundred years from now the Government to become the purchaser is too absurd to be entertained for a moment. The reason is they want the advantages that are given to enterprises of this kind that bear the Government approval. They wish to go upon the market when the first holders of the securities will part with them and say, "This is in reality a great Government enterprise; it is protected by the United States; it has rights and privileges that are not accorded to the ordinary common carrier, and therefore you can pay a larger price for these securities than you would pay for securities of a like character issued under State authority."

Then, again, it is quite likely that this bill, framed as it is, gives the incorporators greater advantages than they could take to themselves under the charters given by the legislatures of Ohio and Pennsylvania. I know not what substance there may be in this latter suggestion, but we are in ignorance of the terms of the Ohio and Pennsylvania charters. We may logically conclude that the reason they abandon those is that they expect to get through Congress a measure which will give to them greater advantages than they could possibly have under the limitations that are placed upon them by the State legislatures.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PATTERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. KNOX. I desire to call attention of the Senator from Colorado to the fact that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] yesterday introduced, and it was accepted, an amendment which makes it impossible for this concern to do anything in the State of Ohio or anything in the State of Pennsylvania without the legislative consent of those States. So the whole thing will have to be dealt with by the States.

Mr. PATTERSON. I recall that very well. That does not militate against my proposition. I understood very well the significance of the amendment that was offered by the Senator from Alabama; that the right of eminent domain can not be exercised without legislative approval, but that does not militate against the proposition I have made, that it is probable these gentlemen come to Congress for a charter because they can get better terms as to their stock and bonds and in other important particulars through a Congressional act than they got through the charters granted to them by the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. May I ask the Senator from Colorado a question?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. Does not the Senator from Colorado think that if there were any terms in the Ohio and Pennsylvania charters that Ohio and Pennsylvania ought to impose upon this enterprise, they would impose those same terms when the company went back to get legislative consent to exercise the right of eminent domain, without which they could not move a hand?

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh, Mr. President, we have no right to enter into the realms of speculation. How do I know what terms the legislature will exact? There is a simple proposition now to be presented to the legislatures of Ohio and Pennsylvania: "This work has been chartered by the General Government. The money is in the treasury. The company is ready to proceed with its construction. All we ask from you—Ohio and Pennsylvania—is that we shall have permission to exercise the right of eminent domain under your State laws." Neither does that militate against the proposition that these gentlemen come to Congress because they can get better terms from Congress than they were able to secure from the legislatures of Pennsylvania and Ohio.

There is another matter I would suggest. Section 22 of the bill does not properly safeguard the taxing power of the State. The provision is that the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania may tax this company as they tax foreign corporations. I do not know what that means. One thing I do know, is that all the property and all the franchises of this company will be within the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania. I know it is not a foreign corporation in the sense in which the term is generally used. A foreign corporation can not enter a State to do business without complying with the terms that the State legislature imposes for the privilege, while this corporation may enter Pennsylvania and Ohio vi et armis, in defiance of and ignoring every State statute that applies to foreign corporations, and, having once received the authority to condemn land under the right of eminent domain, to construct their work and proceed with their business in total disregard of State laws applicable to foreign corporations.

I discover also that this bill discriminates between property and franchises, and while franchises might perhaps be embraced in the term "property," yet since franchises have risen to pronounced judicial and legislative recognition only within the past few years as property that may be distinctively taxed as other property commensurate with their real value, it is of importance that the distinction between franchises and property observed in other sections shall be observed in the provision for the taxing of the property of this corporation in the two States. Before the proceedings on this bill are concluded, I intend to offer an amendment that will secure the right of these two States beyond peradventure to tax both the property and the franchises of the company.

But, Mr. President, however this bill may be perfected, one thing is certain: I am convinced there is no chance to eliminate the wild-cat features of the bill. There is no purpose to attach to the bill the amendment of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] or any similar amendment. It is only by an amendment such as he proposes that anything like a square deal can be secured for the people of those two States and to those who may use the canal for freighting purposes, or to the Government of the United States when the time may come, if it ever does come, when the Government will take it over.

Mr. President, this bill is pernicious. It is dangerous. Its passage should not be seriously thought of by the Senate. I do not stand in the way of the construction of any great public work. I should like, as well as the Senator from Pennsylvania, to see the canal constructed. I should like as well as he to see it constructed as he doubtless would some similar enterprise out in the great West. I realize as fully as anybody can the supreme importance of cheap and speedy freightage. I realize that where channels are glutted or where the cost of transportation is high, prosperity is clogged, and business is endangered.

But, Mr. President, while I favor enterprises of this kind, I desire that they shall be constructed in the old-time methods, under authority from the States, and that the provisions for the floating of their liabilities shall be so guarded as that the people can not be cheated and that extortion can not be practiced upon the Government.

I know, and everybody else knows, that when the Interstate Commerce Commission shall undertake to regulate freights, it will be largely controlled by the amount of the liabilities that exist in the way of fixed charges against any transportation line. The Commission will first inquire the amount of bonds and the amount of stock. It will declare that the interest shall be paid upon the bonds and that fair dividends shall be paid upon the stock. It is only after these are provided for that a rate will be fixed, and the rate will be fixed with reference to them. When Congress swells the amount of the liabilities that may thus attach, away out of proportion to the cost of the work, away beyond what even in their wildest dreams the friends of this enterprise have contemplated as its cost, it imposes upon the Commission a duty from which they can not escape, of fixing tolls to meet the interest and the dividends; and the Supreme Court of the United States, should the Commission fail in that regard, would overturn its finding and allow freights and tolls that would provide for them.

The amendment offered by the junior Senator from Wisconsin is fair and reasonable and just. It is legislation that has been tested in the oldest of the States, and is found upon their statute books at the present time. It is legislation which long experience has taught is necessary to prevent the practice of undue extortion upon the people and to keep the cost of these enterprises, that are represented in the markets of the world by stocks and bonds, within reasonable limits. If the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, which I understand is taken almost bodily from the statute books of Massachusetts, is adopted, then the real danger, so far as the financial end of the enterprise is concerned, will be avoided. The amendment will not interfere in anywise with the speedy construction of the work. It will only place an impediment in the way of wildcat exploitation and of saddling upon the shippers of the country and ultimately upon the Government charges, and in the end a cost far beyond what they should be.

I will not take up any more of the time of the Senate. I have done what I believe to be a plain duty. It would be much more congenial to me to heartily support a measure that the Senators from Pennsylvania so earnestly urge than to oppose it in any fashion.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, until I heard the argument of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] I supposed that this bill would be of some advantage and benefit to the people of the United States, and especially to those who are contiguous to the water courses which would be affected by this canal. But if you take the drift of the Senator's argument, it amounts to this—at least, in one part: That this is simply a stock-jobbing scheme on the part of certain people in Pittsburg to make money.

The construction of this great canal from the waters of Lake Erie to the head of navigation on the Ohio River is something in which all the people of the Northwest and of the entire Mississippi Valley are interested. It is not a mere matter of these incorporators. It is the matter of securing navigation from the Great Lakes down the Ohio and into the Mississippi River for the purposes of commerce. No one can question that the Federal Government has the right to construct such a canal. Neither can anyone doubt that such a canal is necessary in the interest of commerce. Whatever the Government can do, the Government can delegate power to a corporation to do. As long ago as 1819 Chief Justice Marshall, in the great case of McCulloch v. Maryland, laid down the doctrine which ought to be the controlling doctrine and the governing principle in this case. Chief Justice Marshall held that while the Constitution did not in terms authorize the United States to establish a bank, yet the United States was interested in a bank because of the necessity of carrying on its fiscal operations, collecting and disbursing its revenues, and hence the Government of the United States had authority to establish a bank for that purpose and could vest the power in a corporation.

If the United States has the power to establish a bank, and to vest the power in a corporation created by the National Government under the Constitution, as construed by Chief Justice Marshall, manifestly under that much clearer power of the Constitution—the power to regulate commerce—Congress has the power to delegate that authority to a corporation. Congress has itself the power and the right to make provision for the construction of such a canal, and Congress can delegate that power to a corporation created by Congress. So we need not have any misgivings as to the constitutional authority on this point.

In the next place you will find that Congress has from time to time engaged in such enterprises as this, not by creating a corporation, but by delegating the power to the States to build international highways, and by giving them Congressional aid. I find, in looking over the statutes of Congress, that in 1852 Congress granted to the State of Michigan the right to construct a canal—then called the "St. Marys Canal," since called the "Soo Canal"—to connect the waters of Lake Superior and the lower Lakes, the canal running through a military reservation, and gave the State of Michigan 750,000 acres in aid of that enterprise. The State of Michigan proceeded to construct the canal and operated it for years, and in doing so it was acting as the agent and the trustee of the Government of the United States. Whether the Government confers the power to construct an international waterway upon a State, a municipal corporation, or a corporation created by the Government, as is proposed in this bill, can make no difference in principle.

That canal was constructed and operated for years by the State of Michigan. Afterwards, in 1881 or 1882, the Government took possession of that canal. It took possession of it because it was necessary to enlarge it and make it a much bigger canal to meet the necessities of navigation on the Great Lakes. Since then the Government has appropriated hundreds of thousands of dollars to enlarge and extend that canal. It has built two sets of great locks there and otherwise put the canal in such a condition that it is one of the great canals of the world, not in distance, but in the amount and extent of the commerce which it carries, exceeding by many thousands of tons the commerce carried by the Suez Canal. In fact, the commerce carried by the Soo Canal equals the commerce carried by all the other canals in the world.

Our own Government is to-day in the midst of constructing the Panama Canal, a canal to be constructed outside of the boundaries of the United States, in territory over which we had no interest until we simply got a strip of territory sufficient to build the canal. If, for the interest of the Government, we have a right to build a canal across the Isthmus, and if it is in the interest of commerce, manifestly it is in the interest of the Government to build such a canal as the one here provided for.

This is not the only example, Mr. President. In 1827 a grant of land was made to the State of Illinois for the construction of a canal from Lake Michigan to the Illinois River, to connect with the Mississippi River. There was another instance where the Government of the United States delegated the power to construct an international waterway to one of the States of the Union, and it gave it a land grant of one-half, five sections in width, on each side of the canal.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. I simply want to say to the Senator from Minnesota that no one will controvert what the Senator is saying. Every Senator who is at all familiar with the history of legislation knows that Congress has repeatedly aided States in the construction of canals.

Mr. NELSON. But they are not State canals. They are interstate canals; they are canals for interstate commerce.

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh, well, Mr. President, the New York and Erie Canal, the Wabash and Erie Canal, and quite a number of canals were constructed by the States.

Mr. NELSON. I want to ask the Senator from Colorado what is the difference in principle between the Federal Government delegating power to a State to construct a canal for interstate commerce and conferring it upon a corporation created by the Federal Government?

Mr. PATTERSON. If the Senator from Minnesota is not able to distinguish between the granting of authority to a State to operate a canal wholly for the interests of the people of the State——

Mr. NELSON. No; not for the interest of the State, but of the people of the United States.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator from Minnesota is entirely too impetuous. He asks questions and gives no opportunity to answer them. Everybody knows that when a State constructs a canal, as it would be did the United States construct a canal, the canal would be used for the benefit of the public, and not for the purpose of exploitation——

Mr. NELSON. A canal——

Mr. PATTERSON. It would be run for the purpose of giving to those who would use such utilities the cheapest freights and the best service, while the private corporation which constructs a work would usually use it for the largest amount of profit and the worst possible service that it could possibly get along with. It seems to me, Mr. President, that there is a very wide difference.

Mr. NELSON. The assumption of the Senator is entirely unwarranted. The assumption that because an enterprise is conducted by private parties instead of by a municipal corporation, the private parties are corrupt and dishonest——

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. That is an assumption unwarranted by the facts. There is as much ground for assuming that a private corporation will be honest in the performance of its duties as the public functionaries of a State.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NELSON. And the Senator's own State bears witness to that fact. His own city of Denver bears witness to the fact.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. NELSON. For a question.

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh, only for a question?

Mr. NELSON. That is all.

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not want to ask a question. I simply wish to make a statement that would be but a fair reply——

Mr. NELSON. I am willing to answer questions.

Mr. PATTERSON. A reply to what I might call almost in the nature of a personal appeal to me——

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no; I am not appealing at all to the Senator. The Senator must not take it in that light.

Now, in the case of the grant made to the State of Michigan in 1852, we authorized the State of Michigan to construct that canal. We gave the State of Michigan a land grant of 750,000 acres, and we authorized the State of Michigan to collect tolls, just the same as this corporation is authorized, and the State of Michigan had the right to collect tolls.

The Senator is laboring under the impression that all the object of securing this national incorporation for building this waterway is simply a matter of private gain and private exploitation. It is nothing of the kind. To construct this canal without a charter from the Federal Government there would have to be two corporations, one corporation in the State of Pennsylvania and one in the State of Ohio.

In the next place, one of the chief reasons why this should be a national corporation is that it may be put under national regulation and national control.

Then, in the next place, in order to secure the necessary water for this canal, water must be drawn from a great many navigable streams; and as to the water from those streams, the Federal Government and not the State governments is the controlling power.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator please indicate what are the navigable streams from which this water is to be drawn?

Mr. NELSON. The Allegheny is one of them. I can not recall all the streams.

Mr. BACON. Is the Allegheny above Beaver a navigable stream?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir; it is navigable for a certain class of boats above Pittsburg.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. There are other streams. The Senator from Pennsylvania can give more information, because he resides at Pittsburg.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to state for the information of the Senator from Georgia, if I may in this connection, that this charter in terms provides for taking all the waters that occupy the bed of the Beaver River, which is navigable for 12 or 15 miles from where it empties into the Ohio River, for vessels of quite considerable size. They are wholly within the control of the United States, because the Beaver empties into the Ohio there at that point and makes an interstate highway. Of course the State of Pennsylvania could not grant a charter to a corporation to take the water of Beaver River or occupy a portion of the bed of the river.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. May not Congress give to a corporation organized under the laws of a State the authority to do every one of the things proposed in this charter just as it gives authority to construct a bridge across a navigable stream?

Mr. KNOX. That is exactly what we are doing here. We are trying to get that authority under this bill.

Mr. PATTERSON. But we could do that just as well under your State charter, and there would be no controversy then over the propriety or impropriety of the new departure that this Government is asked to take.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. Of course, there is no answer to that argument except that it is within the discretion of Congress to grant a charter when it sees fit.

Mr. PATTERSON. Very well.

Mr. KNOX. If the character of this enterprise is not important enough to challenge the attention of Congress, they ought not to grant the charter. If the character of this enterprise is of sufficient importance and the connection between the Great Lakes and the Mississippi Valley in large enough for our attention, then it is a matter of discretion.

I want to add right here, talking about precedents, when in 1889 the Congress of the United States granted to a private corporation, for the purpose of facilitating commerce between the Atlantic and Pacific States, a right to construct a canal at Nicaragua, it did exactly what we are undertaking to do here, except that the interests of this country were far more indirect in that case than they are in this case.

I might, as another historical fact showing the relations of the United States to this proposed canal, state that as far back as 1824 the Congress of the United States appropriated $10,000 to survey this very canal, and although they did not go on and construct it, the State of Pennsylvania subsequently did construct the ordinary type of canal between the Ohio River and Lake Erie and operated it until the days when the railroads came upon the board, when it was set aside and foolishly abandoned, as the canals of the country generally were abandoned.

Mr. PATTERSON. Does not the Senator from Pennsylvania differentiate between a charter by Congress that could not be granted by a State, a charter to construct a canal across the Isthmus——

Mr. KNOX. The Senator from Colorado certainly forgets that it is proper enough to grant a charter by any State to operate or construct a canal or any other enterprise in a foreign country. The United States to-day holds every dollar of stock in the Panama Railroad, a corporation of the State of New York, and is operating a railroad across the Isthmus of Panama.

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh, Mr. President, as a matter of course, if the Senator from Pennsylvania can see no difference between the Federal Government granting a charter to a corporation to construct a canal at different points of the Isthmus to connect the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific and charters that are granted or taken out every day in the year under the laws of the several States for the construction of domestic and interstate enterprises, and an act of Congress for the construction of a railway or a canal within the limits of the United States, then, as a matter of course, the argument ceases to be of avail.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. PATTERSON. Just one moment. We who have opposed this bill have not opposed it upon the ground that Congress did not have the power. The Supreme Court settled that long ago. It is more or less a question as to whether or not it is a wise policy, a sound and a safe policy, for the United States to put its brand of approval upon an enterprise such as this, when there is no impediment in the way of charters from State governments and the completion of the work under such charters.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NELSON. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. I owe the courtesy of the floor to the Senator from Minnesota for the time I am taking, and I apologize to him; but I do wish to say a few words in reply to the suggestion "if the Senator from Pennsylvania does not see any difference between granting a charter to a corporation to dig a canal across Central America at Nicaragua and charter to a corporation to construct a canal which connects the Great Lakes with the Mississippi Valley," I wish to reply that I do see a great difference, and the difference is in favor of constructing the canal here at home, where we get immediate benefit from it.

There is less reason, in my judgment, Mr. President, why the Congress of the United States should charter corporations and turn them loose over the face of the globe in order to change its geography, even though we do get an indirect benefit from it, than to construct or to authorize the construction of great works in the interior of our country, which give the people cheap transportation, which help to regulate the domination of the railroads, and against which no honest objection based on anything else than innuendo and assumption has been advanced in this Chamber.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. Undeniably the argument which has just been used by the Senator from Pennsylvania may be applied with equal force and equal logic to a railway corporation that is intended to extend and develop the commerce of the several States; and his logic simply leads irresistibly to the end and the result that those of us who oppose this bill anticipate——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado will suspend for a moment. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6191) to provide for the construction of a sea-level canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the method of construction.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. PATTERSON (continuing). That the barrier will be broken down by legislation of this character, and soon Congress will be flooded with bills for national charters for the construction of railways, and the functions of State in matters of that kind will be eliminated.

The Senator has no right, it seems to me, to suggest that there was any sophistry or improper effort in dealing with this bill upon my part when I exposed what I contend are its shortcomings. The Senator has not undertaken to answer the proposition that I made with reference to the financiering of this concern. One of the strongest causes that can be urged against legislation of this kind is that the Congress of the United States will be called upon to put its seal of approval upon many enterprises of this character, though not perhaps for canals, and measures may be even more loosely constructed with reference to fictitious values of public works than is this measure.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that instead of using language which seems almost like epithets, it would be better for the Senator to meet the suggestions that I urge and to show that they do not exist. I understand, as a matter of course, there is nothing personal in this controversy. I do not doubt the absolute good faith of the Senator from Pennsylvania; and I do not like to hear the Senator impugn mine. I have studied this bill with a good deal of care, and I have attempted to give no false coloring to a single one of its provisions. With the provisions in the bill as they are the Senator should be content, if he is able to secure the approval of this body to it, and not indulge in reflections upon the motives of those who opposed it.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. It is rather amazing that I have said anything to impugn the motives of anyone who has seen fit to oppose this bill. I spoke of the arguments. I spoke of the arguments that were based upon assumption—assumption as to the character of the parties who were back of this bill, assumption as to their purposes, assumption as to the results, innuendo as to the relation of large organizations and capital with this enterprise which does not appear upon the face of these papers, and which I know to be absolutely without foundation.

Now, if anything can be found in that expression which, by the most remote processes of reasoning, can be figured out to be a reflection upon anyone's motive, I freely say to the Senator that no such thought ever entered my mind, and I can not see how it is possible to deduce it from what I have said.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator from Pennsylvania has not undertaken to throw much light upon the personnel of the men whose names appear in this measure.

Mr. KNOX. I know nothing about it except what appears on the face of the papers. Is every Senator bound to know who the gentlemen are whose names appear upon the face of the bill? As I said, the city from which I come is a city of 600,000 people. I have the good fortune to know a great many of them and to know them well. I know some of these gentlemen, and those of them whom I know are men of the highest character, although they are not subject to the suggestion that they are millionaires.

Mr. PATTERSON. In the absence, Mr. President, of definite information, and in view of the avowed purpose for which this bill is being passed, it seems to me that Senators may very properly indulge in what they conceive to be logical deductions, in view of the lack of definite information; and that was all that I did.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. PATTERSON. So far as my suggestions were concerned, with the possibilities and even the probabilities, taking into consideration the provisions of this measure, the ignorance of the Senator from Pennsylvania about it, as he has repeatedly avowed, knowing nothing about it except as he finds it coming into this Chamber from the other branch of the Capitol, we are justified in probing, as we must probe since we can not get information otherwise, for the purpose of reaching something like an intelligent conclusion.

Mr. KNOX. I think the Senator from Colorado must be laboring under a misapprehension. I owed no duty to the Senate or to the Senator from Colorado to disclose anything about this bill. The Committee on Commerce owed that duty, and have discharged that duty. I have assumed, as the Senator from Colorado should have assumed, that that committee fully satisfied themselves as to the character of the parties who are back of this bill and their good faith. I think the Senator from Colorado must have been laboring under the assumption that I am a member of the committee, which I am not.

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. PATTERSON. Just one moment. I simply labored under the impression that the Senator is a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania; that he is a resident of the city of Pittsburg, and that he is a Senator of great knowledge and learning and ability. I also assumed, Mr. President, that the Committee on Commerce was made satisfied as to certain things. But that does not preclude Senators, when the measure is before the body, from seeking information from Senators who may be presumed to be able to impart it, and it is not the subject of criticism when an effort of that kind is made. The bill, when it comes from the Committee on Commerce, is open to the fullest and freest discussion and criticism from every Senator, everyone being willing to give to the measure whatever credit is its due by reason of the fact that it was reported by a committee of the Senate. No one is precluded. Time and time again the work of a committee is rejected by the Senate. I have no doubt in the world that the Senator from Pennsylvania has done his share of that kind of work, and will continue to do it whenever he feels it to be his duty to do so.

So I have gone upon the presumption, as have the other Senators who have opposed this measure, that it was open to full and free discussion, and that legitimate deductions might well be drawn both from the language of the bill and its surroundings.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, as I understood the main body of the argument of the Senator from Colorado on this subject, it was entirely on a different line and on a different assumption from the argument of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. The Senator from Georgia argued in respect to the bill as a matter of principle; but the argument of the Senator from Colorado, as I understood him, was based on the assumption that these men are not of much consequence; that it is a dangerous stockjobbing scheme, and that for that reason we should halt in this measure.

Mr. President, this is not a mere matter for the State of Ohio or the State of Pennsylvania. If it was a matter that only concerned those States, I should care little about the bill. I should take no interest in it; but to my mind, next to the construction of the Panama Canal, there is no other canal project of greater importance to this country that is discussed at the present time than is this canal.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. NELSON. Let me finish what I am saying. I will do as the Senator from Georgia many times does, and ask him to let me finish it.

The construction of this canal from the waters of the Ohio to the Great Lakes not only connects with that entire lake system clear to Chicago and away up to Duluth, in my own State, but by means of this canal and by means of the Erie Canal connection is made with the Atlantic seaboard, and coal can be carried in boats through this canal over Lake Erie, through the Erie Canal, down the Hudson River, and along all the Atlantic coast.

Congress is given the power to regulate commerce. The great virtue of a waterway of this kind is not only the fact that it affords a new and additional method of transportation, but the greatest advantage of all advantages is that it is the best regulator of tolls and rates.

We have had in the State of Minnesota for years a railroad commission, we have had the advantages of the Interstate Commerce Commission, such as it has been, with the limited powers it has had, but of all the benefits we have had in the matter of rate regulation the most important has been the fact that we have been in connection with the water system of the Great Lakes and could transport our traffic down those lakes. That has been the one great advantage.

This is a canal, Mr. President, that does not concern the people of Ohio, it does not concern the people of Pennsylvania, as much as it concerns all the other people of the country, all the great States bordering on the Mississippi River. From the Southwest Pass up the Mississippi, and from the junction of the Ohio clear up to St. Paul, and up the Missouri River, all the people along those water courses are vitally interested in this canal. It is no local project. It is a project of great national importance; and hence it ought to be constructed under the auspices of the Federal Government.

If the Federal Government would construct this canal, I would much sooner see the Government do it than any private corporation, but to get the Government of the United States at this time, while they are in the midst of constructing the great Panama Canal, to undertake a great enterprise of this kind is hopeless. But public-spirited men are ready and come before the country and say, "If you will give us the authority, we will build this great waterway and afford these advantages to the people of the United States."

Now, not only is this a canal that all the people of the country are vitally interested in, but there is another reason why the canal should be constructed under the auspices of the Federal Government, through a corporation, if the Government will not do it. If it is a Federal corporation we can control it. This bill puts the power of regulating the tolls and rates to be charged on this canal under the Interstate Commerce Commission, and under existing laws and any laws that may be passed supplemental and amendatory thereof. By section 15 of the bill the plans and specifications and the whole scheme of the construction of this canal are to be submitted to the Secretary of War, and must meet with his approval.

We have here, then, first, what we could not hope to have if this were a canal to be constructed under State auspices, a canal, the plans, specifications, and scheme for which must be submitted to the Secretary of War, representing the Federal Government, for his approval. In the next place, the Interstate Commerce Commission is given the power to regulate and control the rates of toll.

I will now say a few words as to the criticism of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] in respect to the cost of this canal. The Senator read from a pamphlet stating what it was supposed the canal would have cost years ago. Mr. President, when the survey for this canal was made years ago, it was for a small canal, and the expense of building it then would have been much less. The estimate was based on a canal of very limited size, with fewer feeders and fewer obstacles to be overcome in the shape of building over railroad tracks, under railroad bridges, and over other similar works.

The committee took especial pains in the consideration of this bill. I want to say to the Senator from Colorado that the committee which had charge of the bill considered it for several days. A delegation of eminent men from Pittsburg were here and appeared before us. We heard them, and they furnished us ample evidence, as ample as could be, that the promoters and incorporators named in this bill were men of high standing, of good character, and with ample means. We took especial care to inquire of those gentlemen what would be the cost of the canal and why its cost had been increased. The proposed company was represented by its chief engineer and by consulting engineers. I asked those gentlemen to furnish us the grounds and reasons why the cost of the canal was so much larger than it was at first apprehended it would be; and I have here a letter from those engineers, which I will ask the Secretary to read.

Mr. BACON. Before that is read—the Senator has passed from the point I wanted to interrupt him upon, for the purpose of making an inquiry—I wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota something about the Chicago Canal. The Senator speaks of this as essential for the purpose of connecting the waters of the Great Lakes with the Mississippi Valley. Is it not true that there is already a canal built at Chicago, which is a very much more direct canal than this, and which can be enlarged and made a canal which will furnish water communication between the Great Lakes and the Mississippi?

Mr. NELSON. Not at all.

Mr. BACON. Is not that true?

Mr. NELSON. Not at all. The Senator is entirely mistaken. There was a plan for such a canal, but it was never consummated.

Mr. BACON. I did not say that it had been consummated.

Mr. NELSON. It was never consummated, and never can be. The only canal there of any consequence at present—and that is not of any advantage for the purposes of navigation—is the so-called "Chicago Drainage Canal," which connects Lake Michigan and the Des Plaines River. The fact is that neither the upper Illinois River nor the Des Plaines River is at all navigable.

Mr. BACON. No; but is it not the fact that with the water that comes from Lake Michigan to the Chicago Canal, and with the water from the two rivers which the Senator has mentioned, it is perfectly practicable to so enlarge that canal as to connect it with the waters of the Mississippi River?

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. BACON. Without any lock, I mean—say up to the point where you reach the river?

Mr. NELSON. Not at all.

Mr. BACON. There is no lock there, is there?

Mr. NELSON. The whole river is so shallow and limited, that if you wanted a canal of the dimensions of this canal, you would have to lock the whole river, and whether you would build locks in the canal or in the river would make but little difference in the matter of navigation.

Mr. BACON. I want to correct the Senator, if he will pardon me. The Senator did not understand what I said. I said, without a lock from Lake Michigan to the point where you reach the river, but, of course, there must be locks after you reach the river. It is a larger canal, and is of more importance to the commerce of the Great Lakes than this proposed canal can possibly be.

Mr. NELSON. No; it is not. This canal has even greater advantages than that. While that canal would be of great advantage, it would not be of the advantage that this canal will be; and I will explain to the Senator why this canal is more important than even the canal to which he alludes.

This canal passes through the great heart of the anthracite coal region of Pennsylvania. That coal is distributed to the remote portions of this country; and this canal will be one of the great instrumentalities for distributing that coal.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PENROSE in the chair). Will the Senator from Minnesota permit an interruption by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. I only want to make an additional answer to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to that which has been given by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. The Senator from Minnesota has already partially answered. The peculiarity of the commercial situation which demands the construction of this canal is this: The great bituminous coal fields sweep down from western Pennsylvania, through West Virginia, into Kentucky. The coals from those fields are needed along the shores of Lake Erie, along the shores of Lake Michigan, and along the shores of Lake Superior. The ores of the upper Michigan Peninsula and the ores of upper Minnesota are needed all along that coal deposit. It is an economic fact that it is cheaper to haul the ore to the fuel than it is to haul the fuel to the raw material. Therefore there is freight both ways—the coal up to the Lakes, and the ore down to the coal—which can not be conducted by a canal across from Lake Superior to the upper Mississippi tributaries without bringing the freight down to Cairo and down the Ohio River, which is impossible.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Minnesota will pardon me further——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Nobody is disputing, of course, the fact that there will be found in any locality particular reasons why there may be particular freights which would be available there and which would not be elsewhere; or there may be more freight at some points than at others; but the Senator from Minnesota was expatiating upon the fact that this canal was essential and necessary to connect the commerce of the Great Lakes and the commerce of the Mississippi Valley. I was simply pointing out to him, or endeavoring to do so, the fact, speaking thus generally, that between the Great Lakes and the Mississippi River there is already constructed, not a navigable canal, but one which can be converted into a navigable canal, if my information is correct.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no; the Senator is wrong.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Minnesota interrupted me to say no. I simply desire to say that there are those who differ from him on that subject and those who have very great interest in it, and who contend that that can at some day be made a navigable canal, and they propose to try to make it so. I was simply trying to direct the attention of the Senator to the fact that the question of the opening of water communication between the Great Lakes and the Mississippi River was not dependent exclusively on this proposed canal.

Mr. NELSON. It is more dependent on this than on any other canal. There is no way by which boats larger than canoes or skiffs can now pass from Lake Michigan down to the Mississippi River from Chicago.

If the Senator lived in the upper part of this country he could see the great importance of this canal. The State of Minnesota is the greatest iron and ore producing State in the Union. Upward of 30,000,000 tons, if I recollect aright—twenty-eight or thirty million tons—of ore were shipped down the Great Lakes from Minnesota ports within this last fiscal year. That ore is carried down to various points on Lake Erie, and from there it is distributed by rail to the different smelters. Then the boats bring back the coal to Minnesota. The coal is carried from the mines by rail to Lake Erie, and from there it is transshipped by boat to Duluth. Nearly all of the anthracite coal that is used in the State of Minnesota is shipped to that State by the Great Lakes, and distributed from Duluth westward, not only all of the anthracite coal that is used in Minnesota, but the coal that is used in northern Wisconsin, in the two Dakotas, and clear out west even to Montana.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me again? I shall try not to interrupt him afterwards.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Minnesota permit a further interruption from the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I desire to ask the Senator a question: He is on the committee that recommended the passage of this bill, and has doubtless familiarized himself with all the history of the matter. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] has stated the fact that heretofore there has been a canal over this route, which was operated and afterwards abandoned. Now, I want to know from the Senator from Minnesota whether he knows from what jurisdiction the charter was obtained, under which there was constructed a canal over this direct route between Lake Erie and the Ohio River?

Mr. NELSON. I can not tell. That canal was constructed before the days of railroads. It was one of the old-fashioned horse canals, and it was abandoned as soon as railroads were constructed. It was not an international waterway at all. It was simply a little bit of a canal, where the boats were pulled by horses.

Mr. BACON. It furnished water connection, though, between Lake Erie and the Ohio River, did it not?

Mr. NELSON. Oh, well, in a limited way

Mr. BACON. It was practically in operation. Can the Senator tell me whether that was constructed under a Congressional charter, or under a Pennsylvania charter?

Mr. NELSON. I can not tell.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator know that it was not constructed under a Congressional charter?

Mr. NELSON. I do not know under what charter it was constructed, or whether it was constructed under any charter at all.

Mr. BACON. While we are on the subject of charters, I will ask the Senator one more question, and then I will try not to trespass upon him any further. The Senator spoke of the fact that one reason why the enactment of a Federal charter was needed was that otherwise there would be two charters, one a charter from the State of Pennsylvania and the other a charter from the State of Ohio.

Mr. NELSON. I will qualify that statement. Not necessarily two distinct corporations, but if it was a Pennsylvania corporation it would have to go into the State of Ohio to get authority as a corporation to build its canal in that State, the same as the railroads do.

Let me explain to the Senator: In the West we have railroads built through several States, and it is customary in such cases to have separate acts of incorporation from each State. I imagine if this canal were constructed at all under State auspices, it would have to be constructed by a Pennsylvania corporation as to that part of the canal in Pennsylvania and by an Ohio corporation for the part of the canal in the State of Ohio.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Senator, I desire to read from this pamphlet, which has been laid upon our desks here by those who favor the granting of this charter. On page 29 there is a statement, I think, made in the speech of Mr. Shaw, in which this occurs, speaking about the steps which had been taken to secure the construction of this canal:

The committee—

That is, the committee which had undertaken to secure the necessary authority—

The committee procured a general law to be enacted in Pennsylvania authorizing a ship canal company to be organized to construct and operate a ship canal from the headwaters of the Ohio River via the Beaver and Mahoning rivers to the Ohio State line.

That is what was done in Pennsylvania.

A similar law was passed in the Ohio legislature authorizing a ship canal company to construct and operate a ship canal from Ashtabula, on Lake Erie, to the Pennsylvania State line, on the Mahoning River, and authority was given in both States to consolidate their franchises at the State line and operate a through canal from the Ohio River to Lake Erie by one company.

Does the Senator know that that is a fact?

Mr. NELSON. I am not prepared to say. I never saw that pamphlet until it was laid on our desks the other day.

Mr. BACON. Well, then, it is the statement made in the address of Mr. John E. Shaw at the meeting which was held in Pittsburg for the furtherance of this enterprise, and of course the statement must be accepted as absolutely true.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I think no one questions the statement which has just been read. The Senator from Georgia read that statement yesterday, and nobody denied it.

Mr. BACON. I did; and I only read it again, if the Senator will pardon me, because the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] had made statements which were inconsistent with that fact; and he did not seem to be informed of the existence of that fact.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, before I was interrupted quite a while ago, I called attention to the reason why it was necessary to amend the bill so as to allow the canal company to issue more stock and bonds than had at first been thought necessary because it had been found that additional expense would be necessitated in the construction of the canal. I stated that the committee took special pains to ascertain that fact. One of the engineers of the company appeared before the committee, and I asked him and the other engineers of the company who had examined and estimated for this work to send us a communication and give us the reasons why the canal would cost more than they supposed it would cost in the first instance. Mr. President, I ask to have the letter of these engineers on this subject read. I think it will prove a complete answer to all the insinuations of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary proceeded to read the letter referred to.

Mr. NELSON. I ask that the remainder of the letter be printed in the RECORD without reading, as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter in full is as follows:

LAKE ERIE AND OHIO RIVER SHIP CANAL COMPANY,
Pittsburg, Pa., March 20, 1906.

DEAR SENATOR: When House bill 14396, for the incorporation of the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, was under discussion at the meeting of the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Commerce Saturday last, the 17th instant, and the cost per mile of constructing such canal was under consideration, the said subcommittee desired to be informed on the reasons for the increased cost over and above what it was estimated in 1895, when a similar bill was before Congress. The bill of 1895, introduced in the House, called for a stock issue of $300,000 per mile and an equal amount of a bond issue; the bill introduced in the House in 1906, under No. 6003, called for a stock issue of $500,000 per mile and an equal amount of bonds, which latter figures were changed by the House to the former amount in amended House bill 14396, also of 1906, this being done without the engineers for the canal company being heard in the matter. The increased capitalization per mile requested in House bill 6003, 1906, over what was called for in the bill of 1895 is, of course, a result of increased cost of construction of the canal. This increased cost is due to the following reasons:

1. The unit prices used in 1895 were somewhat too low, even for that time, when the country was at a low-price era.

2. The unit prices of 1906, both for material and labor, are, of course, very much higher than they were in 1895, as, for example—

(a) The units for excavation of earth and rock, both in the dry and in water, have increased on an average of about 50 per cent over what was assumed in 1895.

(b) The units for masonry in locks, walls, dams, bridge piers, and abutments and paving of banks have increased on an average of 20 per cent over and above what they were in 1895.

(c) The unit prices for timber have increased about 60 per cent above what they were in 1895.

(d) The unit prices for embankments for reservoirs have increased about 33 per cent above those in 1895.

(e) Cost of operating machinery for locks has increased about 40 per cent.

(f) Cost of bridges has increased about 100 per cent over what they were in 1895, principally due to great increase in weight per foot of trains and union wages of bridge erectors.

(g) Miscellaneous accessories have also increased in cost.

3. The engineers of 1906, having the benefit of the work of the engineers of 1895, have developed the enterprise much more in details and have thus learned that several items of work are necessary which were not taken into account in 1895, as, for example—

(a) Ten miles more of the canal will require masonry retaining walls for the banks.

(b) A great deal more paving for bank protection is required.

(c) The dams and locks have been changed somewhat in their location and canal levels have been lowered, thus requiring increased excavation.

(d) In raising the bridges and railroads crossing the canal grades have been eased up, requiring longer approaches.

4. The freight traffic between Lake Erie and the Pittsburg district, in the ten years that have elapsed, has increased over 100 per cent, calling for increased facilities on existing railroads as well as the building of new railroads in that territory. This has been considered in planning the projected canal, as it will, of course, secure its share.

(a) The number of bridges has increased about 15 per cent since 1895.

(b) The weight per foot of trains having increased, much heavier bridges have been estimated upon.

(c) The now more crowded condition of the territory through which the canal runs, due to new railroads and double tracking of existing railroads, has made it necessary to estimate for the more expensive bascule bridges than the simple swing bridges where drawbridges will be required.

5. Freight traffic on the Lakes has increased correspondingly in the last ten years, as has also the number of boats, as well as their dimensions.

(a) It being estimated that the canal will also get its full share of this increase in traffic, both on the Lakes and the railroads, requiring much more frequent locking and increased speed of boats and better facilities for their passing in the canal, it has been deemed wise to increase the width of the bottom of the canal whenever feasible by about 30 per cent.

(b) To insure more safety to the vessels traversing the canal it has been considered advisable to contemplate two gates at each end of the locks, so that should the inner ones be damaged the outer ones will protect the vessels and allow continuous operation of the canal. A middle gate for smaller crafts has also been contemplated. This will, of course, increase the length of the masonry work in the locks by at least twice the width of the lock gates, so that the total increase in cost of the locks, gates, and machinery over and above that estimated in 1895 is about 70 per cent.

(c) Provision for a probable additional parallel lock somewhat smaller has also been contemplated should future increase of traffic demand it.

(d) The increased locking, estimated from the so enormously increased traffic, calls for additional water supply, and consequently additional reservoirs and feeders, and the total increase in cost of such reservoirs will then be about 60 per cent and for the feeders about 200 per cent over and above that contemplated in 1895.

6. The enlargement of the Erie Canal in New York State, which is now an assured fact, will of course increase the traffic on the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal.

7. Such traffic will also be favorably affected by the present and future Government improvement of the Ohio River, which seems to be now assured.

8. The increased prosperity of the country through which the canal has to pass has materially increased the value of real estate throughout this region, besides more detailed investigation of this subject has probably something to do with the great increase in the cost of land per acre, inasmuch as we have found that—

(a) The increased value of land on the river divisions is about 600 per cent over what was estimated in 1895. The 1895 figure was likely an error.

(b) Forty per cent from Niles to Lake Erie.
(c) Forty per cent for the feeders.
(d) One hundred per cent for the reservoirs.

The above-enumerated causes for the increase in the physical cost of the canal over and above what was estimated in 1895, augmented by the present prosperous conditions and development of the region which the canal traverses makes the present estimate of the engineers run up to $500,000 per mile, in round numbers, for the physical construction alone of same. In addition to this there are a number of items, the cost of which can not be determined in dollars and cents at present, such as damages to existing works and rights, etc., with their legal expenses, but which nevertheless enter into the actual cost of the canal, feeders, reservoirs, and their accessories. These items in a large enterprise like this, experience shows, call for a very liberal percentage of increase in the estimated cost over and above the physical cost to meet the actual final cost of the project.

In view of this, the permissible capitalization should be ample to meet all probable contingencies, even though the issue of stocks and bonds should not be more than is actually required for the building of the said canal, feeders, reservoirs, and their accessories, to thus enable the incorporators to carry the enterprise to a successful conclusion.

Very respectfully, yours,

GEORGE M. LEHMAN,
Chief Engineer.
EMIL SWENSSON,
THOMAS P. ROBERTS,
Consulting Engineers.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
The Senate Committee on Commerce, Washington, D. C.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say in conclusion, for I am unwilling to take up the time of the Senate any further on this subject, that if this were simply an Ohio and Pennsylvania enterprise, if it merely affected those States, I should take no special interest in this bill beyond that of any other Senator; but the construction of this canal, Mr. President, is vital to all the commercial and industrial interests of the great Northwest and of the great State of Minnesota, which I have the honor to represent in part on this floor. We are as vitally interested in the construction of this canal and in being placed in communication by water with the Ohio River and with the navigable waters connected with that river as any portion of the people residing along that water course or along the Great Lakes. It is because of the national importance of this enterprise, it is because of the fear that the National Government itself will not in the immediate future embark in this enterprise, that I favor this bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I object to being placed, even by implication, in opposition to securing reduced transportation charges to the people of the Northwest because I have offered some opposition to certain provisions in the bill as reported by the committee. The State that I have the honor in part to represent is as much interested in this legislation as the State of Minnesota, and I have quite as much interest in securing reasonable transportation rates for the people of my State and this country as the Senator from Minnesota has.

With example and illustration on every side of the overcapitalization of transportation companies, I ask Senators whether the present be not a pretty good time to make reasonably certain that the corporation which proposes to build this great canal shall not be overcapitalized? It is no reflection upon the honor or integrity of anybody connected with this enterprise to suggest governmental supervision as a protection to the public against the stock watering which has been resorted to by every other corporation in the country which is engaged in transportation.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] said in opening the debate upon this bill that cheaper transportation means better living for the people; that it means cheaper iron and cheaper coal. That would be true, Mr. President, if the market price of steel and iron and coal were not absolutely controlled by the steel trust and the coal trust. But with great combinations masters of the markets of these basic products of our industrial life, who will be benefited by cheaper transportation rates on iron and steel and coal? Have we any guaranty offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania that, if transportation rates are reduced on iron and steel from the Lake Superior iron belt to Pittsburg and upon coal transported through this canal from Pennsylvania to the lake ports, have we any guaranty, I ask, that the consumers will get any benefit from the reduced rates?

If iron and steel and coal were sold in the domestic market, with free competition between independent producers, consumers would realize a benefit in reduced transportation rates resulting from the construction of this canal. But, Mr. President, I am in favor of building this canal, and I hope to see the day when open competition between our own producers of iron and steel and coal will be restored, and all of the people can enjoy a share in the lower transportation charges which our great waterways can secure to us when improved and the commerce upon them regulated as the need may arise.

So, Mr. President, I stand here in this body to urge that when this corporation is granted its charter the public rights shall be protected as well as the rights of the incorporators. I do not oppose the passage of this bill for the incorporation of this canal company, but I shall contend here and elsewhere that the Government, State and national, shall put forth all its legitimate powers from this time on to prevent the overcapitalization of all public-service corporations.

I ask Senators can any fact or reason be urged against the amendment which I have offered? Will anyone rise and defend watering the stock of transportation companies? Are Senators in favor of the products of the country being taxed at a rate that is necessary to pay dividends and interest on capitalization that is not represented by investment? When these questions go to the country, they will require answer, and that answer will have to satisfy the American people, who understand their rights and are fast making ready to assert and maintain them.

The time has gone by, sir, when they will longer consent to see the transportation companies of this country capitalized beyond the amount of the investment necessary properly to equip those companies and to maintain and operate them. They clearly understand that every dollar of overcapitalization imposes an extra charge to be paid upon every hundredweight and every ton of traffic transported.

Mr. President, Senators may regard me as unduly earnest and positive in my assertions. I do not believe I am. I believe I can judge the temper of the American people as well as any other Senator upon this floor, and I say that with becoming deference. Within the last few years I have looked into the faces of thousands of your constituents in all the States between Pennsylvania and the Pacific slope, and I tell you here to-day that you underrate the interest and the intelligence and the determination of that great body of people if you think they will longer consent meekly to pay arbitrary trust prices for manufactured products and extravagant transportation charges in order to furnish an income to the holders of watered stocks.

What is the proper time to limit capitalization to actual investment? If not now, when we are on the threshold of chartering this company, when will the Federal Government put a proper restriction upon the capitalization of this company? Surely the experience of this Government admonishes us to consider it now.

Hark back over the years of the history of chartering transportation companies by the Federal Government. The Northern Pacific divided the whole nominal amount of its stock, $100,000,000, among the promoters, who paid nothing for it, before scarcely any expenditure was made upon the road. The Central Pacific was likewise constructed by its promoters, and the greater part of the stock issued went to them as a gratuity. Mr. Poor, an authority who surely makes no statement prejudicial to the railroad companies, says the Union Pacific divided and carried to the credit of profit and loss over $100,000,000 more than a fair return upon the capital invested by them.

The St. Paul and Manitoba Railway Company—the Great Northern, lessor—was bought on foreclosure at $3,600,000. Its capitalization was forced up to $84,000,000; to be exact, $84,500,000. The State of Minnesota through its courts made an appraisal in the Great Northern rate case, and held that the cost of the reproduction of all the property of the company at that time would not exceed $44,000,000, showing nearly 50 per cent of water.

The Atlantic Coast Line increased its capitalization $50,000,000 without any additional investment, to enable Morgan to get control of the Louisville and Nashville.

J. J. Hill testified in an investigation in the Northern Securities merger case that in the purchase of $108,000,000 of securities of the Burlington by the Great Northern and the Northern Pacific companies, $216,000,000 of new 4 per cent bonds were issued. In the recapitalization of the Rock Island $75,000,000 of Rock Island stock was converted into $75,000,000 of bonds and $137,000,000 of new stock.

The Chicago and Alton was capitalized at $30,000,000. When turned over to the purchasing syndicate in 1899 it was capitalized at $94,000,000.

Mr. President, there is not a dollar of water or inflation in the capitalization of the railroads of this country that does not impose burdens upon the consumers and producers of this country; and when we are to-day proposing to charter a canal company to construct a canal through which shall move all the lake commerce of that great inland sea, can any Senator interpose a fair and reasonable objection to a proposition which simply requires the Government to stand guard over this capitalization and see that it is not excessive?

I deny that any provision of that kind is a hindrance to the enterprise. I deny that it defeats the purpose of the bill or will obstruct the organization of the company. I am willing to assume—and in so doing I put the gentlemen who are named in this bill as incorporators in a more favorable light than do those who oppose this amendment—I am willing to assume that the incorporators do not wish to overcapitalize the company, and if they do not, they surely will not object to authorizing the Government to say, "When you issue so many thousand dollars of bonds and so many thousand dollars of stock upon any given mile of the canal, we ask you to show that your corporation has made an investment of equal value for every dollar of that proposed issue of stock and bonds."

Possibly this is new doctrine in this Chamber. I do not know; I have been here but a few months. But if this legislation has not been contended for here before, you will hear more of it in the near future. Two States have statutes along lines similar to the amendment which I have proposed to the pending bill—Texas and Massachusetts. Other States are struggling for such legislation. In my own State, in Wisconsin, I recommended incorporating such a provision in the law regulating railway rates and services, which was written into the statutes of that State in 1905. The public-service corporations were strong enough in the State senate to defeat the legislation proposed in accordance with that recommendation, as they were able to defeat certain other provisions of importance to the public in the law enacted at that time. But in that State and in many other States, and presently in all the States of this Union, the people will take up this issue. They will compel legislation which will regulate and control within the States the issuance of stocks and bonds.

It is time the National Government, through the action of this Senate and the other branch of the National Congress should take like action with respect to every corporation over the capitalization of which it may, under the Constitution, exercise a control.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. NELSON. I move to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to lay on the table the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. MALLORY and Mr. PATTERSON demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 3 the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal Company, its successors and assigns, shall issue only such amounts of stocks and bonds, coupon notes, and other evidences of indebtedness payable at periods of more than twelve months after the date thereof as the Interstate Commerce Commission may from time to time determine is reasonably necessary for the purpose for which such issue of stock or bonds has been authorized. And the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby authorized and empowered and it shall be its duty to determine, upon application, what issues of stocks, bonds, coupon notes, or other evidences of indebtedness may be reasonably necessary to pay the cost of construction, equipment, maintenance, and operation of said canals and works. Said Commission shall render a decision, upon an application for such issue, within thirty days after final hearing thereon, which decision shall be in writing, shall assign the reasons therefor, and shall, if authorizing such issue, specify the respective amounts of stocks or bonds or of coupon notes or of other evidences of indebtedness as aforesaid which are authorized to be issued for the respective purposes to which the proceeds thereof are to be applied. Such decision shall be filed in the office of the Commission, and a certified copy of such decision shall be delivered to the said canal company, which shall cause the same to be entered upon its records before any stocks, bonds, coupon notes, or other evidences of indebtedness thereby authorized are issued. Every certificate of stock, every bond, and other evidence of indebtedness of such canal company operating as a lien upon the property of such company which shall be made, issued, or sold without compliance with this act shall be void. Any officer or director of said canal company who shall knowingly make any false statement or shall withhold from the Interstate Commerce Commission any information requested by such Commission to procure the approval of said Commission to any issue of stocks, or bonds, or coupon notes, or other evidences of indebtedness shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in the United States district court of the district in which such offense is committed shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not less than two nor more than ten years, and shall likewise be liable to any creditor of such company for the full amount of damages sustained by such wrongful act.

Mr. MALLORY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On the question of agreeing to the amendment, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DANIEL. A roll call will show whether there is a quorum present or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to know whether this is a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment or a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a call of the Senate.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the calling of the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, after line 2, page 4, the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That no issue of bonds or stock, in excess of $5,000 of bonds and $5,000 of stock per mile of said canal, shall be made under authority of this act until estimates have been submitted to the Secretary of War and be by him authorized as being within the limit of the fair cost of the construction of said canal and its proper equipment and operation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, objection was made to the amendment just voted upon by the Senate for the reason that it gave no opportunity to this corporation to make even a preliminary organization. That objection was not well founded; but in order that Senators shall have no excuse to oppose the protection which this amendment is aimed to secure to the public, I now offer an amendment which provides that the question of capitalization shall be submitted to the Secretary of War, but that the corporation may make its organization and issue $5,000 per mile of stocks without the consent of anybody, but that after such issue shall be made all other issues of stocks and bonds shall be authorized by the Secretary of War as being within the limits of the reasonable cost of the construction of said canal and its proper equipment and operation.

Surely, Mr. President, no argument which has been offered in opposition to the amendment just laid upon the table can apply to the one which I now propose.

Mr. NELSON. I move to lay the amendment upon the table.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAY (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. CLAPP (when his name was called). I transfer my pair, as on the previous vote, to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN], and I vote "yea."

Mr. HOPKINS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MALLORY (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I again announce that I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE].

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. I also desire to state that my colleague [Mr. CLARK of Wyoming] is unavoidably absent from the Senate to-day.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to announce my pair with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. MALLORY. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] is absent unpaired. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN], and I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 19, as follows:

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. CULBERSON. At the end of line 2, page 4, I offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 3 the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That all stock, bonds, and other evidences of indebtedness issued in excess of that allowed under the provisions of this act shall be absolutely null and void.

Mr. NELSON. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. At the end of line 9, page 4, I move to add:

Or the creation of additional indebtedness.

So that it will read:

Nor shall any dividend be paid by the issue of additional capital stock or the creation of additional indebtedness.

Mr. NELSON. I have no objection to that amendment to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. DANIEL. I am instructed by the Select Committee on Industrial Expositions——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas has the floor.

Mr. CULBERSON. If I can yield to the Senator under the new rule, I will be glad to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not think that under the new rule the Senator from Texas can yield for that purpose.

Mr. DANIEL. I am much obliged to the Senator, but I do not request leave to interrupt him.

Mr. CULBERSON. On page 10, line 25, after the word "company," in the first line of section 14, I move to insert:

Subject to and in conformity with the laws of the respective States through which such canal may be constructed.

Mr. NELSON. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move to strike out section 5, on page 4.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 5 of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 5. That the said company may from time to time set aside a portion of its net earnings to be a sinking fund for the redemption of its said bonds or securities, with or without unearned interest, at such times, in such proportion, and in such manner, by allotment or otherwise, as may be determined by the board of directors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word on that amendment. Section 5 provides:

That the said company may from time to time set aside a portion of its net earnings to be a sinking fund for the redemption of its said bonds or securities, with or without unearned interest, at such times, in such proportion, and in such manner, by allotment or otherwise, as may be determined by the board of directors.

Mr. President, if the tolls which this company is fairly entitled to charge on the commerce to pass through the canal must be subject to the rate fixed by the Supreme Court with respect to other common carriers, then this section ought not to be permitted to remain in the bill.

The Supreme Court of the United States has fixed the measure of the transportation charge which the common carriers of the country may lawfully levy upon the commerce of the country. What is it? A fair return upon the fair value of the property operated for the convenience of the public. Section 5 of this act gives legislative sanction to this corporation to charge tolls upon the commerce that will pass through this canal to lay by a surplus out of which it may pay the principal and interest of its bonds. It authorizes this corporation to impose such transportation charges upon the commerce to pass through the canal as can free its stockholders from furnishing at least one-half of the capitalized value of this canal.

Any charge made upon the commerce of this country which exceeds a fair interest rate upon the amount of money invested in the building of the railroad or the canal is an unjust tax upon the commerce of the country. When you empower by legislative implication a corporation to which you give a charter to charge rates high enough not only to pay interest upon bonds and dividends upon stocks, but also to set aside a surplus that shall ultimately discharge the bonded obligation of the company, you are surely imposing upon the commerce carried by this company an unlawful and unjust burden.

I am well aware, Mr. President, that under the present system of financing such enterprises the railroads of this country do exactly that thing. They charge on the commerce of the country rates high enough to pay a fair return upon a fair value of their property. They go beyond that. They make the transportation pay a fair return upon the watered and inflated capitalization of the railroads of the country. They go beyond that. They make the transportation of the country pay enough more to set aside a surplus out of which they may make their improvements, and then they make those improvements the basis of new capitalization and advance transportation charges upon the people.

I will put into the RECORD in this connection some of the wrongs the great transportation companies inflicted upon the commerce of this country. From 1899 to 1905 the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company made improvements or betterments out of its surplus exacted from the people in excessive transportation charges to the amount of $19,000,000. The Delaware, Lackawanna and Western from 1901 to 1904 exacted $13,347,100. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company took by excessive transportation charges out of the people on its lines and made improvements to the extent of $50,000,000. The Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company took $26,000,000; the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company took $9,000,000; the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis and Omaha Railway Company, $31,000,000 between 1899 and 1905; the Illinois Central Railway Company between 1900 and 1905 took $16,630,000; the Norfolk and Western Railway Company between 1900 and 1905 took $12,250,000; the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company between 1896 and 1904 took $30,000,000; the Great Northern Railway Company between 1898 and 1905 took $15,850,000; the Northern Pacific Railway Company between 1898 and 1905 took $19,999,603; and the Union Pacific Railroad Company between 1900 and 1905 took $13,479,165.

Every dollar of that amount of investment in the betterments of those railroad companies was paid out of the surplus which was exacted from the transportation of this country and imposed upon the consumers of the country in direct violation of the rule laid down by the Supreme Court as to what is the legitimate transportation charge, and section 5 of this bill, which I have proposed by amendment to strike out, will warrant and authorize this canal company to make an excessive charge for the payment of its bonds.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In one moment.

This canal company is placed by another section of this bill under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it is provided in that section that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall so regulate tolls upon all of that commerce passing through the canal as to make those tolls reasonable; but I undertake to say that if this Congress, in section 5 of this bill, authorizes this canal company to set apart enough surplus to pay off its bonded indebtedness, any court will be bound to construe the section with respect to any action of the Interstate Commerce Commission in fixing reasonable tolls at such rates as to enable this canal company to set apart enough money to discharge, under the provisions of section 5, all of its bonded indebtedness. Surely, if the people of the country are to be charged tolls sufficiently high to pay off the bonds of this canal company, then the people ought to own the canal and be authorized to take possession of it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the amendment be stated, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is to strike out section 5 of the bill. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] moves to lay the amendment on the table, on which motion the Senator from Wisconsin asks for the yeas and nays. Is there a second? In the opinion of the Chair there is not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then I ask for a division upon it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich	Clarke, Ark.	Hansbrough	Overman
Ankeny	Clay	Hopkins	Patterson
Bacon	Culberson	Kean	Penrose
Benson	Cullom	Kittredge	Perkins
Berry	Daniel	Knox	Pettus
Beveridge	Dillingham	La Follette	Piles

Bulkeley	Dubois	McCumber	Spooner
Burnham	Flint	Mallory	Stone
Burrows	Foster	Millard	Teller
Carter	Frazier	Morgan	Warner
Clapp	Fulton	Nelson	Warren

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I renew my request for the yeas and nays upon the pending amendment to strike out section 5.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BERRY. What is the question, Mr. President—on the motion to lay the amendment on the table?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAY (when his name was called). I announce my pair on this amendment and other amendments to this bill with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLINT. The junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON] desired me to make the announcement that he is paired with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN]. If the Senator from Nevada were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CLAPP. I again announce the transfer of my pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN], and will vote. I vote "yea." I make this announcement of the transfer of my pair on this measure for the rest of the afternoon, and will not make further statement of it.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to state that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] is paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT] on this bill and on all party votes.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand that no quorum has voted, and therefore, in spite of my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], I will vote in order to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. PATTERSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, page 3, it is proposed to strike out the following proviso, beginning in line 14:

Provided, however, That the amount of debt created by the issue of bonds shall in no case exceed the amount of stock subscribed for and paid in in money, or property at its fair value.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, however, That the amount of debt created by the issue of bonds shall in no case exceed the amount of stock subscribed for and paid in in money at the face or par value of such stock, and such bonds shall neither be sold nor paid for at a greater discount than 5 per cent of their face or par value.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, when I explained this morning that under the provisions of this section at least $80,000,000 worth of bonds and $80,000,000 worth of stock might be issued and sold without regard to the price and before even any work was done, thus saddling $160,000,000 worth of obligations upon property that could not cost more than $50,000,000, I think the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] said that he could see no objection to the amendment that I suggested then and now send up for consideration, with this exception that the amendment I now present allows a margin of 5 per cent on the price at which the bonds shall be sold and paid for, allowing a discount of 5 per cent instead of requiring that the bonds shall be sold and paid for at their face value. If this amendment be adopted, it will prevent the sale and issuance of stock at less than the par value of the stock, and will allow a margin of discount of 5 per cent upon the bonds when they are issued and sold.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I did not reply in the early part of the afternoon to that portion of the Senator's argument which referred to this clause of the bill in extenso, but the frequent interruptions which I inflicted upon him indicated to him, I think, the position which I take with reference to this section. I think the interests of the public are fully guarded by the provisions of the bill as it came from the committee. I assume that the Senator from Colorado unconsciously stated that at least $80,000,000 of bonds and at least $80,000,000 of stock could be saddled upon this corporation. I think he meant that, at most, that amount of indebtedness could be incurred under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes; that is what I meant—"at most" that much could be saddled.

Mr. KNOX. That that would be possible; yes, sir. Mr. President, the language of this proviso, to my mind, absolutely prohibits the issuing of stock unless it has been fully "paid in in money or property at its fair value." The language of the second proviso is:

Provided further, That in no event shall the stock issued and debt created be more than may be necessary to construct, equip, maintain, and operate said canal, etc.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania in that connection to the fact that at the end of that provision an amendment was added, on motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], that all bonds in excess of that should be null and void.

Mr. KNOX. I am obliged to the Senator for calling my attention to that. It had for the moment escaped me. But it is undoubtedly clear that no stock can be issued unless it is fully paid up either in money or in property. If the bonds and the stocks together can not in any event exceed in the aggregate what the property actually cost to construct, I do not see how it is possible for any fraud to be perpetrated on the public under the provisions of this bill, particularly having regard to the amendment to which the Senator from Minnesota has just called my attention, providing that any overissue beyond the amount that will be necessary to construct this canal will be null and void. Under the restraint we have placed upon the board of directors who will manage the affairs of this corporation they themselves would be personally responsible to the holders of those bonds, to the corporation, or to whoever might suffer for any issue which was in excess of the actual cost of the property, and the issuing of bonds which are by the law chartering the corporation null and void would make every man who participated in that issue liable to whoever might suffer by reason of it.

If I had any doubt at all in my mind as to these provisions being adequate to protect the public against fictitious securities, I should not hesitate to vote for the amendment; but having no doubt, I am entirely satisfied with the provisions of the bill as it came from the committee.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I at least caused the Senator from Pennsylvania, when I was speaking this morning, to agree with me that such a change in the proviso was possibly desirable. Since then he has satisfied himself that it is not necessary. A consideration of the language of the proviso that is stricken out, it seems to me, should convince every Senator that I have not been mistaken in my construction, and also that the amendment of the Senator from Texas does not cure the defect. What is the meaning of the language:

Provided, however, That the amount of debt created by the issue of bonds shall in no case exceed the amount of stock subscribed for?

If you subscribe for a thousand shares of stock at $100 a share, that is what you subscribe for, but that has nothing whatever to do with the sum you pay for that thousand shares of stock. When one subscribes for a thousand shares of stock——

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PATTERSON. I will yield, but I should like to make myself plain to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. I interrupt the Senator with great reluctance; but the Senator's observations must necessarily create a false impression in the minds of the Senate. The proviso does not stop with the words "that the amount of debt created by the issue of bonds shall in no case exceed the amount of stock subscribed for," but it says "subscribed for and paid in in money or property at its fair value."

Mr. PATTERSON. Very well, Mr. President; I was coming to that. The Senator from Pennsylvania inferentially admits that if we stop at the words "subscribed for," then my interpretation of the language would be correct. I think I will demonstrate to him that if that is correct, then the other words to which he called attention in no wise change the legal effect of the clause:

Provided, however, That the amount of debt created by the issue of bonds shall in no case exceed the amount of stock subscribed for.

If you say you have subscribed for a thousand shares of the stock of some corporation, you do not convey any idea of the amount you have agreed to pay for it. You have simply subscribed for a thousand shares of stock; and the next inquiry may be, What was the price of the stock? How can the words "and paid for in money" change the legal effect of the language? It simply means that you have subscribed for a certain number of shares of stock, and the price you have agreed to pay for the shares shall be paid in money or property at a fair value—that, and nothing less and nothing more.

Mr. KNOX. I think the Senator from Colorado is unintentionally mixing two separate and distinct propositions. A subscription to the capital stock of a corporation is a contract to pay for as many shares of that stock at par as may be set opposite the name of the subscriber. It is wholly and entirely different from a contract to purchase a certain number of shares of stock from an outsider or in the market or in any other place where you pay for the stock, no matter what its par value may be, only the price you agree to pay. When you make a subscription, and that is a technical word which has been clearly over and over again defined, you make a contract with the corporation and with its creditors that you will respond to the full par value of the stock for which you have subscribed. I think there is no lawyer in the Senate Chamber who will differ with me upon that proposition.

Mr. PATTERSON. Again the Senator from Pennsylvania agrees I am right provided we use the word "purchase" instead of "subscription."

Mr. KNOX. No; that would change it the other way.

Mr. PATTERSON. Let us see. If the naked proposition is a subscription for shares of stock, then perhaps the position of the Senator from Pennsylvania may be right; but if the corporation having the stock puts it upon the market and fixes the terms of the subscription, the price at which it will be paid for, as it has a perfect right to do, then the subscription is for so many shares of stock at the price fixed by the owner, whether it is the company or a private individual. So undeniably I am right in every position I have taken.

Mr. SPOONER. That is, if it is without notice.

Mr. PATTERSON. What?

Mr. SPOONER. The purchaser of shares of stock from a corporation which have not been paid for is in law as to liability the same as a subscriber. If he sells it to a bona fide purchaser, the certificate reciting that the stock is full paid, the situation is different.

Mr. PATTERSON. If subscriptions for stock are asked for and the terms are not fixed by the company, the courts might hold that it was a subscription for stock at the face or par value. But the owner of stock, it being the company, may fix the terms upon which the stock may be subscribed for, and there is nothing in this bill which prevents the company from fixing the terms upon which subscriptions shall be taken or that prohibits the company from offering the stock upon the market, either to accompany the bonds or independently of the bonds, at whatever price the corporation may fix.

Under those circumstances, all that this proviso requires is that the debt created by the issue of bonds shall not exceed the amount of stock subscribed for, provided the price at which it was subscribed is paid. In other words, no matter what is paid for the stock, for every dollar of stock there may be a dollar of bonds. For every dollar of stock at the face and par value, no matter at what price the company may offer it for sale, the company may issue a bond which represents the same face value.

The Senator from Pennsylvania must at least be frank enough to admit that there is room for controversy upon this proposition. If such be the case, then there is no reason in the world why this amendment should not be adopted, because, according to the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania, it simply effects in terms what he says will follow as an inference. I differ from him most emphatically and clearly on the proposition. I have no question in the world that this stock may be subscribed for at any price that the company may fix, and then a share of stock may be accompanied by a bond, dollar for dollar, and the bonds may be placed upon the market at whatever price the company sees fit to fix.

It is by reason of these provisions that I have asserted and maintained that it is entirely within the power of this company to saddle a debt of a hundred and sixty million dollars upon this public work which ought not to cost at the most liberal estimate, allowing generously and broadly for the increased price of everything that will enter into the construction of the canal, $50,000,000. Under the bill, as it stands now, allowing $50,000,000 for the construction of the canal, which is $17,000,000 more than was estimated two years ago, according to this pamphlet, there is $110,000,000 to go into some one's pocket, and then interest is to be collected upon the full amount, which will go into the pockets of the owners of those securities in the way of charges and tolls upon the shippers who shall use this instrumentality.

I appeal to the Senator from Pennsylvania if—why should I doubt his sincerity?—he believes such is the meaning of the bill, to allow the substitute for the proviso to go in, which puts it beyond peradventure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senate——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is out of order.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to have unanimous consent that the bill may be taken up after the routine morning business on Monday morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is out of order. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll; and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich	Clapp	Hopkins	Overman
Ankeny	Clarke, Ark.	Kean	Patterson
Bacon	Clay	Kittredge	Penrose
Bailey	Culberson	Knox	Perkins
Benson	Cullom	La Follette	Pettus
Berry	Dillingham	Long	Piles
Brandegee	Dolliver	McCumber	Scott
Bulkeley	Dubois	McEnery	Spooner
Burkett	Flint	Mallory	Stone
Burnham	Foster	Millard	Teller
Burrows	Frazier	Morgan	Tillman
Carter	Fulton	Nelson	Warner

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. PENROSE. In case the bill shall not be disposed of this afternoon—and I am anxious that it should be, if possible—I ask unanimous consent that it may be taken up after the conclusion of the routine morning business on Monday morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the bill now under consideration be taken up immediately after the routine morning business on Monday morning, in case it is not finished to-night.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would not object to that, if the bill is to be laid aside at 5 o'clock to-day, but if we are to be held here an unreasonable length of time——

Mr. PENROSE. I did not hear the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would not object to having the bill taken up again under the same order, if it shall be laid aside when 5 o'clock arrives to-day, if it has not been disposed of.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator desires that, I have no objection, although I am sincerely anxious, for obvious reasons, for the convenience of the Senators, that this matter may be disposed of to-day, if possible.

Mr. PATTERSON. I desire to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I know of no good reason, if we shall remain in session to-day as long as we usually do, why the bill should not be disposed of. I have only one other amendment to offer.

Mr. PENROSE. Then the probabilities are it will be disposed of. I wanted to make my request and have it agreed to before the absence of a quorum should be disclosed.

Mr. KNOX. I hope Senators will not impose any conditions upon the consent asked for by my colleague, and that we may go along in the hope that we can get through with the bill to-night.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. NELSON. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to lay on the table the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. PATTERSON. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ALDRICH voted "yea."

Mr. DOLLIVER. I should like to have the amendment reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is too late.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I desire to hear what the amendment is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I should like to have the amendment reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa is out of order. The roll call will be proceeded with.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa is out of order. The roll call will be proceeded with.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I simply desire to enter a protest against any such disposal of our business here.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I transfer the pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MALLORY (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I announced my pair a while ago.

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I again transfer the temporary pair I have with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], and I ask that the announcement may stand for the remainder of the day. I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have already announced that I have a general pair, but an arrangement has been made to transfer the pair so that the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] will stand paired with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], and I will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 28, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS—28.

Aldrich	Cullom	Knox	Perkins
Ankeny	Dillingham	Long	Piles

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19264) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, submit the following detailed statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the conference report:

Amendment No. 1 restores Brazil to the $17,500 class, as previously recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Amendments Nos. 2 and 3 appropriate for Turkey as an embassy instead of legation, and increases salary to rate given other ambassadors, namely, $17,500.

Amendments Nos. 4, 5, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 14, 16, 17, 18, 20, 22, and 23 make necessary verbal changes only.

Amendment No. 6 restores Belgium to the $12,000 class, as previously recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Amendment No. 7 restores Cuba to the $12,000 class, the same amount that was appropriated for this mission last year, and restores the Netherlands and Luxemburg to the same class, as recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Amendment No. 13 increases the salary of the agent and consul-general at Cairo from $5,000 to $7,500 in view of the passage of the reorganization bill taking away his fees of about $1,500.

Amendment No. 15 increases the salary of the secretary of legation to Belgium from $2,000 to $2,625.

Amendment No. 19 decreases the salary of the secretary of legation to Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and San Salvador from $2,800 to $2,000.

Amendment No. 21 inserts the words "whenever hereafter appointed" in the paragraph providing that clerks to embassies and legations shall be American citizens.

Amendments Nos. 24 and 25 increase the appropriation for the repair of the consular building at Tahiti, Society Islands, by $300, and change the word "repair" to "rebuilding."

Amendment No. 26 appropriates $10,000 for the preparation of reports and material necessary to enable the Secretary of State to utilize and carry on the work partly performed by the Joint High Commission of 1898 for the settlement of questions between the United States and Great Britain relating to Canada.

Amendment No. 27 appropriates $25,000 for continuing the survey of the boundary line between Alaska and Canada.

Amendment No. 28 appropriates $20,000 for continuing the more effective marking of the boundary line between the United States and Canada.

Amendment No. 29, as passed by the Senate, appropriates $30,000 for the expenses of a joint commission, to be constituted if the Government of Great Britain concurs, to investigate and report upon the conditions and uses of the St. John River, and to make recommendations for the regulation of the use of the waters thereof by the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain, according to the provisions of treaties between the two countries. The conferees have agreed to recommend that this sum be reduced to $20,000, and as amended it is recommended that the House recede.

Amendment No. 30 authorizes the Secretary of State to submit to Congress a plan for the erection of consular buildings in China, Korea, and Japan, but makes no appropriation.

Amendment No. 31 appropriates $150,000 for the purchase of our present legation building in Constantinople.

Amendments Nos. 32 and 33 provide for consuls at Boma, in the Kongo Free State, and at Calgary, Canada, at $4,500 and $2,000, respectively, and in view of the apparent great necessity for consular representation at those two places, it is recommended that the House agree to these provisions.

Amendment No. 34 increases from $10,000 to $15,000 the fund to pay the expenses of consular inspectors for the coming year.

Amendment No. 35 increases from $500 to $1,000 the limit of the amount which the Secretary of State may allow to any one consulate for clerk hire, where the clerk hire is not specifically allowed by law, and amendment No. 36 increases the fund from which such clerk hire is paid from $50,000 to $100,000, being a reduction of $55,000 from the amount appropriated by the Senate.

Amendment No. 37 increases from $10,000 to $12,000 the allowance for the employment of interpreters, guards, etc., in the Turkish dominions.

Amendment No. 38 increases from $300,000 to $350,000 the fund for the contingent expenses of consulates, which increase is made necessary by the provision for the payment of mileage for consular officers.

The amount of the bill as recommended by the conferees is $65,000 less than passed by the Senate.

R. G. COUSINS,
C. B. LANDIS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. COUSINS. I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Amendment numbered 39: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out in said amendment the word "board," in line 1, and insert the word "boards;" also strike out the words "this board" and insert the words "these boards."

EDWARD MORRELL,
WILLIAM S. GREENE,
F. A. MCLAIN,
Managers on the part of the House.
E. J. BURKETT,
N. B. SCOTT,
JNO. M. GEARIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House, at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18442) to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the board of education of the District of Columbia, submit the following statement in explanation of the action agreed upon and recommend in the conference report:

Amendment No. 1 provides that three of the board of education shall be women. There are three women members of the present board. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 2 provides that meetings of the board of education shall be open to the public, except meetings dealing with the appointment of teachers. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 3 corrects the text of the bill. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 4 provides that the white assistant superintendent of schools, under the direction of the superintendent, shall have general supervision over the white schools and be charged with the unification of the educational work of the white high schools and of all academic and scientific studies in the McKinley Manual Training School and the Business High School. Under the present system these duties devolve upon the director of high schools. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 5 prescribes the duties of the colored assistant superintendent, which correspond to those of the white assistant superintendent, and are enumerated in the explanation to amendment No. 4. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 6 provides for the appointment of a director of intermediate instruction for the white high schools, who shall have charge, under the direction of the superintendent, of the educational work of grades 5 to 8, inclusive. The white assistant superintendent under the present system has charge of the educational work in these grades. The result of amendments Nos. 4 and 6 is to eliminate the position of director of high schools and place the supervision of the educational work in the white high schools and in the McKinley Manual Training School and the Business High School under the immediate control and direction of the white assistant superintendent, he being the next ranking officer to the superintendent, and properly should be charged with the supervision of higher educational work. The position of director of high schools being eliminated and the position of director of intermediate instruction being created, leaves the number of officers and their salaries the same as provided for in the bill as it passed the House. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 7 provides for the appointment of a supervisor of manual training, who shall have supervision, under the direction of the superintendent, of manual training instruction. This covers an omission, as there is such an official at present and provision was made for his salary in section 9 of the bill as passed by the House. The House recedes and agrees with an amendment.

Amendment No. 8 provides for the appointment of a superintendent of buildings and supplies and for one clerk, one stenographer, and one inspector of janitors as his assistants. The Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 9 eliminates assistants to eighth-grade principals. By the provisions of this bill all school principals will now receive, in addition to their grade salaries, $30 per annum for each session room in the grade school buildings over which each has charge. Inasmuch as this extra compensation has been provided for this service, it was decided that assistants were not necessary. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 10 corrects the text of the bill. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 11 and 12 fix the salaries of the teachers of manual training, drawing, physical culture, music, domestic science, and domestic art in the graded schools in classes 3 to 4, inclusive, instead of classes 2 to 5, inclusive, as provided in the House bill. As most of the teachers above enumerated now receive salaries provided for in class 3, it was deemed desirable to limit the minimum salary to $650 and the maximum to $1,100, resulting in a final saving in each case as between the schedule of class 4 and the schedule of class 5. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 13, 14, 16, and 17 provided a higher scale of salaries for high school teachers of manual training, drawing, physical culture, and music than for teachers of domestic art and domestic science. The House bill provided that these teachers should all be grouped in classes 4 and 5. The Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 15 corrects an omission in the bill as passed by the House by inserting "normal and manual training schools" in the paragraph providing salaries for the teachers mentioned above in the explanation of amendments Nos. 13, 14, 16, and 17, and strikes out the word "schools" to correct the text. House recedes and agrees with additional verbal amendment.

Amendment No. 18 provides that the first increase to be received under the terms of this bill in the case of the teachers enumerated in the paragraph shall not exceed $150 per annum, and also provides that the first two years shall be probationary in the case of special beginning teachers in the normal school. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 19 and 20 correct the text of the paragraph, and provide that the salary of the librarian of the teachers' library shall be class 4, instead of class 5 as in the House bill. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 21 provides that the M Street High School and the Armstrong Manual Training School shall be classified into four departments, instead of into three as provided by the Senate amendment and into five as provided in the House bill. The House recedes and agrees with an amendment.

Amendment No. 22 prevents the heads of departments from interfering with the discipline of the schools, and prescribes that no classes shall be formed in the high schools with less than ten pupils, except in the M Street High School in the case of subjects not offered as well in the Armstrong Manual Training School. This limitation, however, is not to apply to pupils who have already entered upon a continuous course of two or more years. The House recedes and agrees with an amendment.

Amendments Nos. 23, 24, 25, and 26 provide that in the promotion of teachers from one class to another the recommendation of the officer having direct supervision of the teacher must be had before action is taken in the matter by the board of education, and, in the case of colored teachers, upon the additional recommendation of the colored assistant superintendent. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 27, 28, 29, and 30 provide that teachers shall be promoted for superior work from group A to group B of class 6 only after oral and written examinations by the boards of examiners, and eliminate certain paragraphs of the bill as passed by the House to make the subject-matter conform to the changes previously made. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 31 and 32 provide that in the promotion of teachers for superior work from Group A to Group B of class 6 such teachers shall be recommended for examination by their respective principals in the case of all high and normal school teachers and teachers of manual-training schools, through and with the approval of the superintendent of schools; and in the case of colored teachers such recommendation shall be made by the colored assistant superintendent, through and with the approval of the superintendent of schools. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 33, 34, 35, 37, 38, and 39 provide for boards of examiners to examine applicants before appointment as teacher, head of department, principal, or supervising principal in the graded, high, manual-training, or normal schools, and that no director, assistant director, or teacher of special studies shall be appointed without being examined. The House recedes.

The Houses recedes and agrees with amendments.

Amendments Nos. 41, 42, 43, 44, and 45 are verbal and correct the text of the bill. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 46 gives to each school principal more authority over the conduct of his individual school. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 47 makes a slight increase in the salaries of the directors of drawing, physical culture, and music, giving them an annual increase of $100 for five years instead of an annual increase of $50 for five years as provided in the House bill. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 48 provides an increase of $200 per annum in the salary of the director of primary instruction. The House recedes.

Amendments Nos. 49, 50, 52, and 53 correct the text of the bill and make it conform with changes that have been made previously. The House recedes.

Amendment No. 51 provided that the white assistant superintendent shall have had at least two years of experience as an instructor in high schools or as superintendent or director of high schools. The Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 54 is for the purpose of preventing any of the officials designated in the paragraph from receiving, under the operation of this bill, a less salary than they are receiving at the present time. The House recedes.

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the conference report be adopted.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

TELEPHONE SYSTEM ON ISLAND OF OAHU, HAWAII.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 4184) to ratify, approve, and confirm an act duly enacted by the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii to authorize and provide for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a telephone system on the island of Oahu, Territory of Hawaii.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Whereas the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii did, by an act duly passed at the 1905 session thereof, authorize the Standard Telephone Company (Limited) to construct, maintain, and operate a telephone system on the island of Oahu, Territory of Hawaii, and which said act was approved by the governor of said Territory on the 26th day of April, 1905; and

Whereas the act of Congress to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii, approved April 30, 1900, provides that the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii shall not grant to any corporation, association, or individual any special privilege or franchise without the approval of the Congress of the United States: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a telephone system on the island of Oahu, Territory of Hawaii, by the Standard Telephone Company (Limited)," approved by the governor of the Territory April 26, 1905, be, and is hereby, amended, and as amended is hereby ratified, approved, and confirmed, as follows, to wit:

"ACT 66.

"An act to authorize and provide for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a telephone system on the island of Oahu, Territory of Hawaii, by the Standard Telephone Company (Limited).

"Be it enacted by the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii:

"SECTION 1. The right is hereby granted to the Standard Telephone Company (Limited), a corporation organized under the laws of the Territory of Hawaii, to construct, operate, and maintain, for the term of twenty-five years from the date of the approval of this act, a telephone and electrical communicative system, aerial, underground, or subaqueous, in, upon, along, and under the highways and public roads of the said island of Oahu, and under the lands and waters of said island.

"SEC. 2. The said telephone system shall be operated by underground wires within a radius of one-half mile, starting from the north corner of Fort and King streets, and beyond said limits such means or methods as may be adopted by said company from time to time, with the approval of the superintendent of public works, or any other official or board having control of the streets and roads where said wires are located, which said officials or boards may, after 1912, at any time that the public interests require it, direct any changes in the method of placing or using said wires that have been or may thereafter be put up or laid that they shall determine to be proper and necessary.

"SEC. 3. If the Standard Telephone Company (Limited) shall at any time acquire, by lease or otherwise, the rights, franchises, and property of any person or corporation operating a telephone system on the island of Oahu, all of the rights, privileges, powers, and authority by this act conferred with reference to the occupation of streets, lands, and waters, maintenance and operation of telephone companies, and also all other powers so conferred, are hereby authorized in the maintenance and use of the property so acquired. All franchises thus acquired shall be subject to all the conditions and limitations of this act.

"SEC. 4. All underground wires shall be in conduits not less than 2 feet beneath the surface of the street, which surface shall be securely supported so as not to impair the use and enjoyment of said streets by the public, and all trenches in which conduits are placed, as well as the manholes connected with the system, shall be constructed in a substantial and workmanlike manner.

"SEC. 5. The said Standard Telephone Company, before laying its conduits or otherwise disturbing any of the streets or roads of the island of Oahu, shall ascertain the lawful grade of such streets or roads from the superintendent of public works or other officials or boards having charge of said streets or roads, who shall furnish the required information within a reasonable time.

"The conduits or other equipment of the said company which affect the surface of the public streets or roads shall conform to the grades of said streets or roads on which they are laid down, as furnished by the superintendent of public works or other officials or boards having charge of said streets or roads, and the said Standard Telephone Company shall not in any way change or alter the same without the written consent of the said authorities. And the Territory of Hawaii reserves further the right to change and alter the line and grades of its streets at any time, and the said Standard Telephone Company shall, at their own cost, within sixty days conform to such new lines and grades in reconstructing its surface equipment or conduits upon receiving notice in writing from the superintendent of public works or other official or boards having charge of said streets or roads, and such changes shall be made subject to the approval of the said officials. And in all cases of street improvements by the Territory, county, or municipality, the said Standard Telephone Company shall conform to all such improvements as directed by the superintendent of public works or other officials or boards having charge of said streets or roads. In case of neglect by said Standard Telephone Company to make such repairs, changes, or improvements required of it by this section, they shall be made by the Territory, county, or municipality which maintains said streets or roads, and the cost of such repairs, changes, and improvements shall be recovered from the said Standard Telephone Company.

"SEC. 6. The said Standard Telephone Company (Limited) shall erect and maintain its poles and lines so as not to unnecessarily interfere with the public use of the streets, alleys, lanes, and highways, and wherever its lines are laid underground shall cause all excavations to be immediately filled upon the completion of such work, and the streets, alleys, lanes, and highways restored to the condition in which they were before such excavations were made.

"SEC. 7. The said Standard Telephone Company (Limited) shall have the right at all times to construct and repair its underground or overhead wires or appliances by them required in the construction, equipment, operation, and maintenance of said telephone system, and to lay, maintain, and operate such additional underground or overhead wires as the business of the said Standard Telephone Company (Limited) may require.

"SEC. 8. The said Standard Telephone Company (Limited) shall from time to time make such rules and regulations for the government of its affairs, not inconsistent with the laws of the Territory of Hawaii, as will protect it from loss, misuse of its instruments, or abuse of its service.

"SEC. 9. Any person willfully and maliciously doing any of the following acts, to wit: Obstructing the free communication of intelligence, message, conversation, or tapping the lines of the said Standard Telephone Company (Limited); defacing, marring, or injuring the poles, wires, or other appliances used in operating, using the poles, fences, houses, or other property, without consent, for advertising purposes, or in any other manner inflicting injury to the property, or causing annoyance and embarrassment in the enjoyment of its property, rights, or franchises to the said Standard Telephone Company (Limited) shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $50 or by imprisonment not exceeding a term of three months, or, upon a second or further conviction, by both such fine and imprisonment.

"SEC. 10. Whenever it shall be deemed necessary that the rights of way over private property should be taken by the said Standard Telephone Company (Limited) and the same can not be acquired by purchase for a reasonable or fair compensation, the said Standard Telephone Company (Limited) is hereby authorized and empowered to take such places or property to the extent only of the actual amount necessary for the said right of way in the manner hereinafter provided: Provided, however, That this act shall not be construed to allow the said Standard Telephone Company to condemn the equipment of any other electric or telephone company.

"SEC. 11. If the person, persons, association, or corporation owning such property does not consent and agree to the use required, and to the compensation offered therefor, the said Standard Telephone Company (Limited) may institute condemnation proceedings in the circuit court of the first circuit of the Territory of Hawaii, which is hereby empowered to hear and determine such condemnation proceedings.

"SEC. 12. The said Standard Telephone Company (Limited) shall have the right to take over, either by purchase or lease, any or all of the property, real or personal, rights, privileges, and franchises, of any other telephone company, and shall have, when so acquired, and may exercise all the rights, powers, privileges, and franchises of such company, whether the same be derived by charter, by municipal authority, by act of the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, or by the United States Congress. All franchises and property thus acquired shall be subject to all the conditions and limitations of this act.

"SEC. 13. The said Standard Telephone Company (Limited), whenever from time to time it shall be deemed expedient in furtherance of the objects by this act authorized, shall have the power to borrow money and to secure the payment thereof with interest agreed upon by mortgages of all or any portion of its property, which may include the franchise, and any such mortgages may be issued, if it be deemed advisable, in the form of mortgage bonds; such mortgages or trust deeds may, in addition to the property named above, cover also any property or property rights to be acquired after their several dates, as well as the income and receipts of the property from whatever source derived. Such mortgages and trust deeds may also contain such provisions as the said Standard Telephone Company (Limited) may deem advisable and proper for the protection of all concerned, relative to payment of interest and principal, possession and operation of said telephone system or other property, default, remedies, foreclosures, powers of mortgagees or trustees in the matter, and all and every other matter which may be deemed wise and proper to insert therein.

"SEC. 14. The said Standard Telephone Company (Limited) shall pay to the government of the Territory of Hawaii a tax of 2½ per cent of its gross receipts from and after the expiration of two years from the date of the approval of this act by the Congress of the United States. Such payments shall be made quarterly.

"SEC. 15. In case of purchase, lease, or acquirement of the property of any other telephone company, as provided in sections 3 and 12 of this act, by the Standard Telephone Company, then and in that case the tax provided for under section 14 of this act shall be paid to the Territory from the date of such purchase, lease, or acquirement.

"SEC. 16. Such portion of the general telephone system required for a general public service as is to be operated in underground conduits, and within one-half mile radius of the point designated in section 2 of this act, shall be completed and in operation within two years from the date that this act is approved by the Congress of the United States; and if the said Standard Telephone Company, or any other person or corporation claiming under this act, shall fail to comply with the provisions of time limitation as expressed in this section, then in that case all rights under this act shall be forfeited, and the privileges hereby granted shall forthwith cease and determine.

"SEC. 17. Any person using the telephone instruments of the Standard Telephone Company shall be liable to pay for the use of such instruments at the following rates, namely:

"(a) Residences situated at such distances from the central office of the company as to require not more than 5 miles of constructed line, not more than $2.50 per month;

"(b) Places of business situated at such distances from the central office of the company as to require not more than 5 miles of constructed line, not more than $4 per month;

"(c) For instruments at places situated at such distances from the central office of the company requiring more than 5 miles of constructed line, not more than $6.25 per month:

"Provided, however, That nothing in this section contained shall prohibit the making of any special contract for any special service.

"SEC. 18. The said Standard Telephone Company shall during the existence of this franchise have and maintain an office for the transaction of business of the company at some place in Honolulu convenient of access to the public, and a majority of the board of directors of said company and other persons having the charge, management, and control thereof shall be residents of the Territory of Hawaii.

"SEC. 19. The entire plant, operation, books, and accounts of said Standard Telephone Company shall at any time be open and subject to the inspection of the treasurer of the Territory of Hawaii or any person appointed by him for the purpose.

"SEC. 20. Forfeiture of franchise.—Whenever said company refuses or fails to do or perform or comply with any act, matter, or thing requisite or required to be done under the terms of this act, and shall continue so to refuse or fail to do or perform or comply therewith after reasonable notice given by the superintendent of public works or other proper authority to comply therewith, the governor and attorney-general shall cause proceedings to be instituted before the proper tribunal to have the franchise granted by this act, and all rights and privileges granted hereunder, forfeited and declared null and void.

"SEC. 21. Franchise not exclusive.—It is hereby expressly provided that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to grant to the company the exclusive right to install or operate a telephone system or systems.

"SEC. 22. This act shall take effect from and after its approval by the Congress of the United States of America.

"Approved this 26th day of April, anno Domini 1905.

"G. R. CARTER,
"Governor of the Territory of Hawaii."

SEC. 2. That Congress, or the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii with the approval of Congress, may at any time alter, amend, or repeal said act.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill if it relates to anything more than the telephone and telephone companies in Hawaii.

Mr. POWERS. Nothing.

Mr. PAYNE. And it does not include any other franchise whatever?

Mr. POWERS. No; no franchise whatever, and no exclusive franchise after this. It expressly states in the bill that it shall not be so construed. It is simply a ratification, as required by the organic act, of a telephone concession which was granted by the legislature of Hawaii. We put in certain amendments, making it a better bill, and reported the bill from the Committee on Territories of the House. A similar bill was reported unanimously from the committee of the Senate and has passed the Senate, and I call up the Senate bill instead of the House bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Is there any regulation of rates?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. POWERS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a similar House bill (H. R. 13392) upon the House Calendar will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

SUBPORT OF ENTRY AT SUPERIOR, WIS.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 19519) to establish a subport of entry at Superior, Wis., with privileges of immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement, and I ask unanimous consent that the same may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan calls up a privileged bill and asks unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Superior, in the State of Wisconsin, be, and the same is hereby, designated a subport of entry in the customs collection district of Superior, and that the privileges of immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement, as defined by the act of June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," be, and the same are hereby, extended to said subport.

With the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the privileges of the seventh section of the act approved June 10, 1880, entitled 'An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes,' be, and the same are hereby, extended to the subport of Superior, in the State of Wisconsin."

Amend the title to as to read: "A bill to extend the privileges of the seventh section of the act approved June 10, 1880, to the subport of Superior, Wis.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended.

There was no objection; and it was so ordered.

On motion of Mr. YOUNG, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 19571. An act to authorize the county court of Gasconade County, Mo., to construct a bridge across the Gasconade River at or near Fredericksburg, Mo.;

H. R. 20070. An act to authorize the Chattanooga Northern Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Tennessee River at Chattanooga, Tenn.;

H. R. 8428. An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters; and

H. R. 14928. An act for the relief of F. V. Walker.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 12323) to extend the public land laws of the United States to the lands comprised within the limits of the abandoned Fort Crittenden Military Reservation, in the State of Utah, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HANSBROUGH, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. MCLAURIN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 15333) for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LONG, Mr. CLAPP, and Mr. STONE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 13372) to authorize the sale of timber on certain of the lands reserved for the use of the Menominee tribe of Indians, in the State of Wisconsin, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. CLAPP, and Mr. DUBOIS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Was it not agreed yesterday that to-day should be for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on War Claims?

The SPEAKER. If this motion were voted down, undoubtedly that would be the order under the rule.

Mr. SIMS. I suppose we might consent to some other day.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I understand from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] that he is willing to allow us to go on with the consideration of the remainder of this bill. I do not think it will require two hours' time.

Mr. SIMS. I thought if it would take this day we could agree on another day.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not anticipate it will occupy more than two hours' time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the Committee on War Claims have five legislative hours, a regular day, notwithstanding this cut in its time, I do not think there will be any objection to going right on with the sundry civil bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, chairman of the Committee on War Claims, informs me that they can probably consider all the bills they want to consider to-day, after the consideration of this bill has been concluded.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I see the actual necessity of getting the sundry civil appropriation bill through the House. If it goes through in an hour or an hour and a half, I will ask for the balance of the time, and if not, I will ask unanimous consent to vacate the order and make a new order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, Mr. Speaker, we have to do that by unanimous consent, and a similar objection would prevent the change of——

Mr. MAHON. All the House could do—the Senate could not pass any bill passed by this House from the Committee on War Claims at this session, and all we have to do is to get them through the House this session.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But we will not succeed in doing that unless the gentleman gets a full legislative day.

Mr. MAHON. The Committee on War Claims has given way four or five times already, and I know the House will be generous to us the next time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why not have this unanimous consent coupled with the other?

Mr. WATSON. What is unanimous consent asked for?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That the Committee on War Claims have five hours.

Mr. TAWNEY. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota demands the regular order.

Mr. MAHON. It is understood, Mr. Speaker, that when this bill is finished we are to have the time.

The SPEAKER. The motion is that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, pending that, if I can be recognized by the Chair, I will ask unanimous consent that upon the disposal of the sundry civil bill the Committee on War Claims be given five hours or so much thereof as is necessary for the consideration of bills reported by that committee.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the chairman of the Committee on War Claims has not submitted any request of that kind, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota demands the regular order.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, this is Saturday, and I do not believe this bill will be finished in two hours. I am informed the Committee on Pensions have no more work this session, and I ask unanimous consent to vacate the order made yesterday, and that next Friday be set aside for bills reported from the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. PAYNE. Be set aside——

Mr. MAHON. Under the rule.

Mr. PAYNE. The same as though it were yesterday?

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. I have no objection, but I am not willing to tie up the business of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil bill, Mr. WATSON in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Hereafter no requisition on the Public Printer by the official head of any Executive Department or bureau, or branch thereof, or independent office of the Government for printing a first edition of any public document or report under the provisions of the joint resolution "To prevent unnecessary printing and binding and to correct evils in the present method of distribution of public documents," approved March 30, 1906, shall be for a greater number of copies than 65 per cent of the whole number of copies of such public document or report now authorized to be printed or which may hereafter be authorized to be printed for any such Executive Department, bureau, or branch thereof, or independent office of the Government, and any additional edition of such public document or report that may be required shall only be printed on the requisition signed by the official head of such Department or independent office, and then only for such number as, when added to the number already required, shall not exceed the whole number authorized by law. All requisitions for printing editions of public documents or reports, additional to the 65 per cent of the whole number authorized by law, as provided for herein, shall be reported to Congress at the beginning of each regular session, together with the reasons for making said requisitions.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve the point of order on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana reserves the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the paragraph is certainly subject to the point of order, but I want to explain to the committee the reason for the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations.

The joint resolutions passed this session, which were intended and believed would prevent the printing of more of the public documents authorized to be printed by the Department than were necessary, by having them printed in several editions, the committee is informed are not being observed in this respect. Now, this provision will enable the Department to print any document it has authority to print up to the maximum number. The Department can not print them all at once or can not print them part at one time and part the next time, except upon condition that the head of the Department gives specific authority therefor. In other words, some clerk or bureau chief can not go and order the full quota allowed by law regardless of whether the quota is needed or not. If there is more than 65 per cent of the quota required, the head of the Department will order the remainder to be printed, giving his reasons therefor. It is subject to a point of order, and, if the gentleman makes it, why, it will have to go out.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon his point of order?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I insist on the point of order, and would like to say in this connection, Mr. Chairman, that the joint resolution of March 30, which the Printing Committee feel will take care of this provision, went into effect under the regulations formulated by the Joint Committee on Printing on the 18th of May.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I can not hear the statement. I am interested in this.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I said I believed the joint resolution approved March 30 and made effective on the 18th of last month would take care of the question which is meant to be covered in this proposition. That gives the heads of all the Departments the right to print in more than one edition, as it gives the Congress the right to print in more than one edition. The joint resolution has been in force but a short time only, and some of the heads of the various Departments have not had time to adapt themselves to it. Some of them have. Some of the editions have already been limited. The President has issued an order in which he directs the heads of the Departments to avail themselves of the opportunities for economy afforded by the provisions of our joint resolution, and in addition to that the Joint Committee on Printing has issued, under the authority conferred upon it, regulations governing this general proposition, which will be heeded by the heads of the Departments we feel sure. I would say to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that a majority of the editions that are now printed by the heads of the Executive Departments are in editions of a thousand or under, some are monthly publications, some weekly, some even daily, and the placing of these publications under this sweeping provision would, in my judgment, result in a greater expense than is now necessitated. In other words, I believe, that is a false notion of economy. The Joint Committee on Printing is giving this matter its best attention. It is receiving the hearty cooperation of the heads of Departments, and we feel confident that when the provisions of the joint resolution are recognized and the efficacy of them is appreciated, that the surplus publications of the Government will be reduced to an absolute minimum. And for that reason I shall insist upon my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. Hereafter there shall be submitted in the regular annual estimates to Congress under and as a part of the expenses for "Printing and binding," estimates for all printing and binding required by each of the Executive Departments, their bureaus and offices, and other Government establishments at Washington, District of Columbia, for each fiscal year; and after the fiscal year 1907 no appropriations other than those made specifically and solely for printing and binding shall be used for such purposes in any Executive Department or other Government establishment in the District of Columbia.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, does the introduction of this amendment in any way affect the privilege of a Member to raise a point of order against the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. What is the question asked by the gentleman?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to know if the introduction of the amendment in any way affects the right of a Member to raise a point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. It can not be done after the amendment has been read.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the point of order against the paragraph comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] was seeking recognition, according to his own statement, to make a point of order, and has simply raised the question as to whether or not the reading of the amendment would preclude him from making the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. We trust the gentleman will reserve his point of order until the committee can explain.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That, of course, I will do, Mr. Chairman, but I want to say to the chairman of the committee in perfect good faith that I was trying to secure recognition for that purpose, and I have absolute knowledge of the fact that another gentleman was also doing it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order must first be determined before the amendment is offered. If the paragraph goes out, there is nothing to amend.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will state, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, but I was willing to reserve it, if the reservation forfeits no right.

Mr. TAWNEY. It does not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can reserve it for debate, and he can reserve it to have the amendment read for the information of the committee; but he can not reserve it and have the amendment offered, because if the paragraph goes out, there is nothing to amend.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It can be reserved and the amendment read for information.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I ask the gentleman from Texas to withdraw the point of order for this reason: The Committee on Printing has been attempting to, in some manner, segregate the various expenditures for printing in such a way as to get them together and arrive at some conclusion as to the amount of money actually spent for printing. Even the Treasury Department is unable to supply this information without an inexhaustible research and examination of miscellaneous vouchers. This provision will enable us to carry on our investigation, and if we are authorized by Congress, I feel sure that by the next session of Congress we will be able to present a report, and Congress can know at the end of each fiscal year every dollar of money that has been actually spent for printing.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I merely reserve the point of order to give the chairman an opportunity to make his statement and to have the amendment read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 167, at end of line 24, insert: "Provided, That nothing in this section shall apply to stamped envelopes and envelopes and articles of stationery other than letter heads and note heads printed in the course of manufacture."

Mr. TAWNEY. I trust I can have the attention of the gentleman from Texas. My colleague on the committee will make an explanation as to the necessity for this provision.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Texas will see that the good of the public service requires that this point of order should not be made. Of course the point of order is well taken, if insisted upon. This simply requires that each branch of the public service shall annually make its estimates of what amount is needed for printing, and that no other fund appropriated for the use of that branch of the public service shall be used for paying printing expenses except the appropriation made upon that estimate. The object is to segregate the expense of public printing from every other expense of the Government, so that we may know just what this public printing is annually costing us. If a Department can unite an expense incident to the preparation of a publication of the Government with the cost of printing in a single item, then there is no practicable means by which we can tell what we are paying for this public printing. For instance, under an appropriation for a report of the Bureau of Animal Industry they can pay not only the cost of the compilation and the preparation of the material for that report for printing, but can pay out of the same item for the printing itself. Thus, manifestly, it becomes impossible, except by a search of books in each branch of the public service by expert accountants, to discover what the public printing has cost the American people. This certainly can do no harm. It requires each branch to estimate its printing separately from the preparation of the material for printing. It requires that when we have then made an appropriation for the printing that the printing shall be paid only out of that appropriation. It certainly tends to an orderly administration of the public business in appropriating money for this purpose to have no money spent for this purpose that is not appropriated for it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I suggest to my colleague that there have been publications, unwarranted, unprovided for, and that were entirely, so far as I believe, useless, that have been sent down there under an order of a chief of bureau? Book after book has been published without authorization. They were sent down there by a chief of a bureau. We want to stop that kind of business; and this is for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia is eminently proper; and that being true, it seems to this committee that we can not intelligently appropriate for the public printing with public printing being paid for out of appropriations under other bills that were not avowedly for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, of course, is aware of the fact that there has been more or less controversy about these items, or those sections of the bill which direct that the Department printing offices shall be transferred to the Printing Office.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That has nothing to do with this item.

Mr. MANN. I suppose this item does not affect that question in any way whatever?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, no.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I did not catch the question of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. There has been some controversy as to these sections of the bill——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Four, 5, and 6?

Mr. MANN. Which relate to taking away from the Departments their printing offices. I understand this section does not in any way whatever affect that question.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am under the impression that it does.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. This has no relation to that?

Mr. PERKINS. I can assure the gentleman that it has not.

Mr. MANN. I supposed the gentleman was under that impression. That was the reason I asked the gentleman from Iowa the question.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I assure the gentleman from Texas that there is absolutely no relation between section 3 and sections 4, 5, and 6. They are for different purposes, and do not in the slightest degree relate to the same subject-matter.

Mr. SLAYDEN. May I ask the gentleman a question——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. In connection with that particular statement?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Having admitted that the point of order is well taken and that the legislation is obnoxious to the rule in two or three ways, do we now proceed merely to discuss the merits?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am simply appealing to the gentleman not to make the point of order.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Well, as the gentleman's mind is fixed now, the point of order will be made. I confess to the gentleman that my particular interest in this item—but I do not want to trespass on the gentleman's time——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is all right.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That my particular interest in this was aroused by the fact that I think it affects in a disastrous way the printing necessarily done in the War Department, a branch of the Government with which I have a lot of business and some familiarity.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Texas permit me to say just this: This paragraph now under consideration has no relation whatever to the branch printing offices, concerning which the gentleman just spoke. It relates solely and alone to the estimates for printing in all the Departments. It does not relate at all to the branch printing offices.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The branch printing offices are paid for out of the appropriation anyway for the public printing, and they will continue to be so paid for under this section.

Mr. PERKINS. If the gentleman will allow me, I am on the Printing Committee and rather familiar with this.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I want to say to the gentleman from Texas that this was submitted to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas that the proposition in which he seems to be interested is covered in a succeeding paragraph.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I am aware of the fact that it is covered in the three succeeding paragraphs.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And I may as well be frank with the gentlemen, and put them on notice, and say now that it has been my intention to raise the point of order against those paragraphs. May I proceed in the gentleman's time for a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that in my judgment I do not believe there is a Member of this House more anxious to see a reformation brought about in the matter of printing than I am. It is extravagant, it is foolish——

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I should like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. SLAYDEN. It unloads on every Member a lot of stuff that he does not want.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I should like to ask the gentleman, in that connection, if there has been unloaded on him during the last six weeks anything that he has not wanted?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes, Mr. Chairman, there has.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. What?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yesterday morning I received by registered mail two expensively bound volumes of printed reports from the Committee on Pensions, telling why somebody in Maine or in Texas or in Iowa was entitled to an increased pension. I do not care for the stuff, and it ought not to be sent to me, and it ought not to be generally printed nor distributed, in my opinion.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I appeal to the gentleman from Texas that there is not a line in this paragraph that can by any possible consideration be held to relate to the branch printing offices. There are two things in this paragraph, first, that they shall make estimates of how much they need for printing, whether in the branch printing offices or in the Government Printing Office; second, that they shall not spend any money for printing except that which is directly appropriated for that purpose. Now, how can it possibly be suggested even that a provision containing those two things can close any branch printing office?

Mr. SLAYDEN. The section says:

SEC. 3. Hereafter there shall be submitted in the regular annual estimates to Congress under and as a part of the expenses for "Printing and binding," estimates for all printing and binding required by each of the Executive Departments, their bureaus and offices.

Now, Mr. Chairman, every day, every hour, and every few minutes, in fact, printing is necessarily done in the branch office at the War Department——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, do not let the gentleman be mistaken in thinking that the printing office of the War Department is a branch of the War Department. It is a branch of the Public Printing Office. Now, they are required to estimate how much their printing will cost for the next year in the War Department.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How can they estimate for orders, for example, issued from day to day, from hour to hour, from minute to minute?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. How can we appropriate money if they can not estimate how much they are going to want? There is no requirement that the estimates shall be absolutely correct.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman knows that in what is known as the Tenth street office of the Record and Pension Office, there is a certain amount of printing paraphernalia belonging to the office which, if this bill passes, will be taken away from them. It is not a branch of the general priuting office. The type is set and the press is run by clerks of the Bureau, and it operates to make a great saving of public expenditure, because it obviates the necessity of writing out painfully and slowly by hand all the various histories of each individual member of a particular regiment in the making of index cards.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I want to say to the gentleman that this proposition is covered in the succeeding paragraph, and I want to make a point of order against that myself. I want to ask the gentleman if he did not give an order for the binding of the books that were delivered to him, as he says, yesterday morning?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not think I did.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. The gentleman does not think he did, but he probably gave a blanket order for the binding of a large number of books, as other Members in this House give blanket orders.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I can not believe that I did. My secretary, jealous of my rights, may have attached my name to it; but never in my Congressional career have I wanted any such books as those.

Mr. MANN. Anybody can ascertain in a few moments by sending downstairs, because there is a record kept of the fact.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If I did do it, I withdraw the order. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I think the gentleman will find that he did give the order, and he must not launch complaints against the House for that.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Now, Mr. Chairman, we are wandering from the question. I hope this will be considered by the House. Here is a proposition that they shall estimate what they want for printing, and when they estimate it and get the money that they shall not spend money for printing that is appropriated for something else. My friend says that they can not to a nicety make the estimate. We can not provide money except on estimates, and the sole question under this clause is whether they shall be entitled to take money appropriated for other purposes and use it for printing, or whether it is better administration to have this money estimated, what they will need for the public printing for either branch, and let us give it to them, and let them spend it out of the appropriation for printing, and not spend money out of appropriations for something else, and so let us know how much we are putting into public printing.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he doesn't believe that section 3 will interfere with and, when taken in connection with subsequent sections, will take away from that little office on F street——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Why, if the subsequent sections stay in, possibly they would, although if the statement is strictly accurate that this institution at the old Record and Pension Office is no branch of the Public Printing Office, then I should say no.

Mr. SLAYDEN. No; I did not say that because that is a branch of the Public Printing Office. This, I specifically referred to a while ago, is not, but is specially provided for by the statutes.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, whether some subsequent section will do it or not has nothing to do with the point of order. This section would not have the slightest tendency to take away that office.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to refer the gentleman to the statutes. Volume 25 of the Statutes at Large, page 52, says:

Provided, That the printing press and the material formerly in use in the office of the Surgeon-General may be used by the Record and Pension division of that office to expedite as much as possible the work of the division, and for no other purpose.

Now, I want to ask the gentleman if he can assure me that he knows that the enactment of section 3 will not interfere with the privilege there stated?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It does not seem to me conceivable that it would interfere with that privilege. I can not find a word in this section that would have a tendency to interfere with it.

Mr. PERKINS. If the gentleman wants further assurance, I can assure him that it would not.

Mr. SLAYDEN. In volume 28 of the Statutes at Large is another provision, where it says:

Provided, That the terms of this act shall not apply to the office in the Weather Bureau or to so much of the printing as is necessary to expedite the work of the Record and Pension Division of the War Department, nor to the printing office now in operation in the Census Office; but the Public Printer, with the approval of the Joint Committee on Printing, may abolish any of these excepted offices whenever, in their judgment, the economy of the public service would be thereby advanced.

Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to and I do not raise a captious opposition to any of this proposed legislation. I do not mind having sections 3, 4, 5, and 6 passed, if the gentleman will except the War Department——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it is impossible to except the War Department from this section, because it has nothing to do with these things that we are talking about.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] is laboring under a misapprehension of the facts. To-day the different Departments are making estimates for printing in different appropriation bills, so that Congress is unable to know definitely how much we are in fact expending for public printing. The effect of this is to consolidate all of the estimates in one estimate. One Department that I know of carries $200,000 this year for printing, independent of the allotment which they receive in this sundry civil appropriation bill. This allotment would indicate that that was all that Department had for public printing, when as a matter of fact, it has $200,000 in another appropriation bill which nobody knew anything about except the members of the committee preparing that bill. This is for the purpose of consolidating their estimates, so that they must be confined and limited to the aggregate appropriation made upon their aggregate estimates, and I hope the gentleman will not insist upon the point of order. The next three paragraphs will be eliminated. They are subject to points of order. They are necessary, I believe, but nevertheless I know there are enough Members in the House who oppose them to know that they will go out. That will leave the War Department and all other Departments that have branch printing offices in exactly the same status that they are in to-day. It does not affect the operation of these branch printing offices in the least.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then in a few words, what is the effect?

Mr. TAWNEY. In a few words, it is to consolidate the estimates for public printing in one estimate, so that we will know what the aggregate cost of our public printing is. That is all there is to it. It does not affect the War Department, and does not affect any Department.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Chairman, I hope my colleague on the Military Committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], will not insist on this point of order as against this section. I think all that he is seeking to get at follows in the other sections.

Mr. TAWNEY. Absolutely.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. There is no question about that.

Mr. PRINCE. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. This is a reform, and a very necessary one.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized for a moment. I was under the impression which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] has and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] has with reference to this section, and I am inclined to think they are right, but I would like to ask for a little information. If I understand it, as a usual rule, the estimates for appropriations are made by Departments and not by subjects. Is that not correct?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. They are made by Departments through the Secretary of the Treasury for subjects.

Mr. MANN. Of course they are transmitted through the Secretary of the Treasury, but they are first made by the Departments to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury, as a matter of fact, is largely formal in transmitting them to Congress. The Secretary of the Treasury, as I understand it, does not segregate the estimates by subjects. He transmits them to Congress by Departments.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. They are segregated when they come from the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean to say that now, on the subject of printing, the Secretary of the Treasury segregates the various items for printing in the different Departments which are carried in the different departmental appropriation bills?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. There are no appropriations for printing generally carried in the departmental appropriation bills, and so they do not come in that form.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will give the gentleman an illustration. Take, for instance, the Weather Bureau. That is not, as I understand it, under the control of the Public Printer.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is a specially excepted Bureau.

Mr. MANN. The estimate for that is not put with the estimates for the public printing. It is put with the estimates for the Agricultural Department.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. No; the Weather Bureau printing is paid out of this large appropriation for public printing.

Mr. TAWNEY. Allotted to the Agricultural Department.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. We appropriate about six millions a year—this year less—for the Public Printer, and we apportion how much of it each branch of the public service is entitled to use.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman sure about that?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Oh, yes; I know that is the practice. As to the item for the Weather Bureau, as I understand it, it is paid out of the allotment from the gross appropriation to the Agricultural Department. That, I think, is not true probably of the Record and Pension Office, which is now known as the Military Secretary's Office.

Mr. MANN. Well, now, I may be incorrect; I will not say incorrect, because I do not know, but I supposed that the printing in the Weather Bureau was made out of the appropriation made for the Agricultural Department.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I will read the paragraph in the appropriation bill:

For the Department of Agriculture, including $25,000 for the Weather Bureau, $185,000.

Mr. MANN. What bill is that in?

Mr. TAWNEY. In the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is the allotment of——

Mr. MANN. Does that include all of the printing in the Weather Bureau, or is there another item carried in that——

Mr. TAWNEY. No; including $25,000 for the Weather Bureau. Now, here is an item of $200,000, carried in the agricultural appropriation bill for printing farmers' bulletins.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am not speaking of that.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, that is the only item that is carried in the agricultural appropriation bill appropriating money for the printing in the Agricultural Department.

Mr. MANN. This section would transfer that item from the agricultural appropriation bill to the sundry civil bill in the form of an estimate——

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it does not follow.

Mr. MANN. It does not necessarily follow, but that is true.

Mr. TAWNEY. But in the estimates the aggregate that the Department thinks is necessary for the next fiscal year for printing would be together in the annual estimates. It would all come as being under the Agricultural Department. Now, that portion which comes under the head of the Public Printer, which is allotted to him now, of course comes under the item of public printing. Then an estimate of $200,000 for this purpose, which comes from the Committee on Agriculture in addition to what is estimated for under the lump-sum appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask for unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. The only difference, then, would be that now the estimate for the printing in the Agricultural Department is made under the head of the Agricultural Department in the estimates, whereas if this section goes into effect it will be made under the head of printing and binding and taken out of the heading of Agricultural Department.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; that is right.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Of course that does not govern the form of future bills.

Mr. MANN. I am talking about the way the estimate is transmitted, so as to put the item for printing in one place in the estimates without intending to affect in any way the jurisdiction of committees in the House or appropriation bills that would——

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that this will give the House some idea of how money is being spent for printing. The Printing Committee had trouble during the investigation last year in segregating the sums expended for printing which were carried in what might be called "miscellaneous" appropriations. For instance, an appropriation is made for certain work in Alaska, carrying with it printing and binding. Say it is a million dollars. So much would be spent for traveling expenses, so much would be spent for surveying, and they can spend $800,000 for printing and binding.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman give me this information? The Librarian of Congress, I know, is publishing now what is known as "records" or "minutes" of the Continental Congress, or something of that sort. I introduced a resolution upon the subject the other day. Out of what appropriation bill is the Library of Congress now paying for that printing?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I presume it is being paid out of their allotment for printing and binding.

Mr. MANN. Well, does the Library of Congress have authority to bind and print whatever it pleases?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. In so far as it does not exceed its allotment.

Mr. MANN. Without regard to having been authorized by anybody?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. They necessarily use their own discretion in the matter of printing and binding, within the limitations of their appropriation.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will read the hearings on the legislative bill at this session of Congress, he will find that subject very thoroughly discussed.

Mr. MANN. He never will have the time.

Mr. TAWNEY. The committee took issue with the Librarian on that very question, and the Librarian submitted a brief on the question of his right to print under the general law, and to print that very document of which the gentleman speaks, out of the allotment "For printing and binding, Congressional Library."

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I could get the attention of my friend from Texas for a moment. I went over these sections myself very carefully, and proposed to make the point of order, if nobody else did, against all of them. I did not think that the Committee on Appropriations had had the opportunity to know in reference to all of these so-called "departmental printing offices," and I do not think they do know as to the necessity of most of them. But it does seem to me, I may say to the gentleman, that this section does not affect the question in any way whatever, except that it gives to the Members of Congress hereafter an opportunity of knowing exactly the sum which can be spent in the different departmental printing offices, and to say whether this Department or that Department shall maintain a private printing office or a departmental printing office. Now, I agree with the gentleman myself that the Weather Bureau should have its printing office, and that the War Department or the Record and Pension division should have its printing office.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The Military Secretary's Office, because the Military Secretary succeeded to the duties of the Adjutant-General.

Mr. MANN. It is perfectly manifest, it seems to me, to any one who considers the subject. Some of those printing offices ought to be maintained, but ought to be maintained solely for certain work. The War Department departmental printing office ought not to be permitted to print those things which could just as well be printed next month as to-day. They ought to be confined to printing that class of work which is most convenient to print at the War Department building, instead of sending it to the Printing Office, such as orders, and things of that sort, and by this method we have some control over that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate in five minutes. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] wants a couple of minutes, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] a couple of minutes.

Mr. MANN. You can not close debate while the point of order is pending.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am willing to close, so far as I am concerned, in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, this discussion is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], he stated that he himself would make a point of order against the next three sections.

Mr. MANN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLAYDEN. You are going to do that?

Mr. MANN. If nobody else does.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then it is your opinion that this section—No. 3—does not affect hurtfully the particular interest of the Government which I was trying to take care of?

Mr. MANN. That is my judgment, after some investigation and thought, and if I did not believe it I would make a point of order myself.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will withdraw the point of order as to section 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have two minutes. I would like to call the attention of the committee to an abuse that has arisen in the House, my attention having been called to it by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], and that is the abuse which has been fallen into by many Members of the House in the matter of ordering bound copies of what is known as the "reserve." The law provides that each Member may have printed and bound, in the binding which he may select—which is a most elegant and expensive binding—copies of all documents and reports. If left to himself, there is not one Member of this House who would order to exceed ten volumes of this reserve, which will amount at this session to about 125 volumes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Ten particular publications.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Now, under the system that prevails, blanks are sent to the Members of the House or to their secretaries——

Mr. TAWNEY. Let me interrupt the gentleman. Is it not a fact that there is a gentleman outside of the Government Printing Office whose business it is to distribute these blanks and secure the orders of as many Congressmen as possible in the interest of continuing in the employ the people down in the Government Printing Office who would not otherwise be employed?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I understand that is true.

Mr. MANN. I wish to say to the gentleman that I have never had anybody since I have been in Washington to present a blank to me. I have not gotten one without going out into the document room for it.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I think the gentleman is an exception to the rule. I will say that within the last three or four days——

Mr. MANN. I have not only not had an order, but I have not signed one this session.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that there are other Members of the House, and I would say in this connection that within the last forty-eight hours there have been a dozen Members of this House to me to make inquiries relative to this abuse. I want to say further that within the last twelve hours a gentleman came to me and told me that last year, without any knowledge on his part, in so far as having ordered the binding of these volumes is concerned, there were dumped in on him at his committee room over 100 volumes most beautifully and elegantly bound. He gave them to the porters and janitors about the hotel. They selected what they chose; the rest of them were scattered and sent to the dump. These volumes cost on an average from two to four dollars, when it comes to their printing and binding.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Apiece?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Two to four dollars apiece. Each Member of this House who signs that blanket order deliberately puts an obligation upon the Government of from $300 to $500 of money that is absolutely thrown away. I will say that within the last few days there have been certain pages of the House circulating among Members with these blanket orders, soliciting their signatures. Now, the committee has had a number of these abuses under consideration. There are many more of them that require attention. This is one of them. This is an abuse to which we are going to give attention when we have time. It has been a great work. The appropriation bill that is now passing shows that the appropriations carried by the bill are $1,080,000 lower than they were last year. That represents to a degree the work of the Commission appointed by this House and the Senate. We are going to ask that this work go on. If it does, we feel that we can show work that will be equally advantageous to the Government and economical at the same time. I want to warn this House against signing these blanket orders. If you gentlemen think you have not signed them, make inquiry at the proper place, and many of you will be astonished to learn that they have been signed for you.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. No money appropriated by this or any other act shall be used to maintain or operate any branch of the Government Printing Office or any other printing office or bindery in any Executive Department at Washington, D. C.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against this section that it is a change of existing law and is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the chairman of the committee desire to be heard?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not; it is subject to the point of order. I intend to offer a substitute, which will affect all the branch printing offices. It will direct the Public Printer to make an investigation and inquiry and report to the next session of Congress. These three paragraphs are subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to offer a substitute now?

Mr. TAWNEY. Not until the paragraphs have been disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. All presses, type, printing material, binding tools and material, and other materials belonging to branch printing offices and branch binderies of the Government Printing Office shall, within thirty days after the approval of this act, be delivered to the Public Printer for use in the Government Printing Office, or, if the same can not be utilized therein, to be disposed of as other unserviceable material of said office is disposed of.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I reserve the point of order upon that paragraph.

Mr. TAWNEY. Why not make it, and let it be disposed of?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order. Does the gentleman desire to say anything on it?

Mr. TAWNEY. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. Hereafter no money appropriated by this or any other act shall be used to establish or operate a branch or other printing office or bindery in any Executive Department at Washington, D. C.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I make the point of order against that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. I offer the following as a new section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. The Public Printer is hereby authorized and directed to make a full and complete examination of the several branch printing offices in the Executive Departments and report to Congress at its next session whether or not their continuance is necessary and of advantage to the Government and whether in the event of their discontinuance the work now done at these several branch printing offices could be as expeditiously and economically performed in the Government Printing Office, and also report to Congress at its next session the probable annual cost to the Government of maintaining these several branch printing offices and the amount invested in the machinery and appliances now used therein, and what the saving, if any, would be in the case of abolition of the branch printing offices or any of them.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, every committee of this House that has ever given any attention to or investigated the subject of branch printing offices reached the same conclusion that the Committee on Appropriations has arrived at in the consideration of the bill now before the committee. Now, there has been, and there is to-day, a great deal of unnecessary work done in these branch offices merely for the purpose of keeping the men employed in them at work. It is a useless expense. Many Members, perhaps, do not fully understand the relation of the branch printing office to the Department in which the branch is located. It is no part of the Department. It is a part of the Government Printing Office. The work that it is doing can be done as efficiently and expeditiously in the Government Printing Office as it can be done in the branch printing office. These branch printing offices are maintained solely for the convenience of the Department, and not because of any real necessity for their existence. We have the largest and best-equipped printing office in the world, a printing office that can do all of the printing for the Departments and Congress, but notwithstanding this fact we are maintaining nine branch printing offices in the Executive Departments of the Government. The Public Printer since he has come into that office has made some investigation, and it was after that investigation and upon his recommendation that this provision was put into the bill.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Public Printer recommended this legislation?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I fail to read it in his testimony before the committee.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, the gentleman has not read his testimony, then, because he has recommended it, and the only exception he makes is the branch printing office in the Congressional Library. Now, the only purpose of this is to direct him, before the meeting of the next session of this Congress, to make a thorough investigation into the necessity of continuing any of them or all of them, reporting as to what branch printing office could be continued advantageously and what offices should be discontinued; in other words, to give Congress full and complete information on the subject. All of these branch printing offices are directly under his jurisdiction. The men are on his pay roll, the property is under his control, and I think it is entirely proper that we should call upon him for information concerning the administration and the work of these several branch printing offices, and whether or not, in his judgment, that work could not be done more advantageously in the Government Printing Office. I can see no objection to this investigation.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I should like to ask the gentleman if he does not know that the Public Printer has authority now to abolish every one of these branch printing offices?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, I question whether he has authority. He may have the technical authority in some instances——

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. He has the authority to abolish every branch printing office, because he has jurisdiction over every one of them.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The law reads that way.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. He can take all persons now detailed to any of these branch printing offices and send them back to the Government Printing Office.

Mr. TAWNEY. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Printing knows that even though he is absolutely convinced it ought to be done, and that he has the power to do it, it is impossible for the head of the Government Printing Office to do anything of that kind. It would be more difficult for him to do it than it would be even for Congress; and I doubt whether it will ever be done, no matter how flagrant the abuses may be. People in these branch printing offices will get Members of Congress to oppose it merely upon their request. I met a gentleman here at the door a few days ago, inquiring for a certain Member of this House. I said, "What do you want with him?" He said, "There is a provision carried in this bill now under consideration abolishing the branch printing office in which I am working, and I want him to raise a point of order against it." I said, "Why so? You will simply be transferred over to the Government Printing Office." He said, "Well, I know that, but if I go over there I will have more work to do than I have in the branch printing office, and that is the reason I don't want to go." Now, I did not know the man, and the man did not know me, but that illustrates the real objection to the breaking up of the branch printing office. The men could not loaf.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota that I am in hearty sympathy with the committee in its desire to legislate along the lines of economy——

Mr. TAWNEY. I realize that.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. And if I thought that in the long run this would result in economy and at the same time do justice on all hands, I would not offer an objection to the passage of this amendment. But I would say in this connection that after having gone into this question in a cursory way, not definitely or fully, but to a limited degree, I am satisfied that some of these branch printing offices possibly may be abolished. I am satisfied that all of them may be curtailed in the amount of work done in the offices. I am almost constrained to say, however, that I am satisfied there is certain work that, from the standpoint of Government interest and the standpoint of economy, should be done in the branch offices.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota, in whose time this discussion has been proceeding, has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I should like in my own time to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question.

Mr. TAWNEY. Pardon me a moment. If the gentleman from Illinois is going to insist on his point of order, why of course this is clearly subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is merely for the purpose of investigation and having a report to Congress.

Mr. SLAYDEN. There is no objection that I can see, except that I want to ask the chairman if he does not think that an investigation by a committee of Congress would bring more satisfactory information?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota that if this investigation is held, it should be held in such a way as to give a hearing to both sides.

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Now, I doubt very much if under the provisions of this amendment the people in charge of this work—that is, the Treasury Department, the War Department, the Pension Bureau, and the State and Navy Departments—I doubt if they would be given as full a hearing and the result would in every way be as satisfactory as if the investigation were made in some other way.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Well, Mr. Chairman, this is all in my time, but I would like to have the privilege of interrogating the gentleman from Indiana. Does not the gentleman think this investigation would be more satisfactory if conducted by a special committee of the House or the Committee on Printing?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I feel that the investigation would be more satisfactory and results more practicable would be arrived at if the investigation were made in the same way that it was made last year on the other reforms. I feel that it would be more satisfactory if it were made in such a way as would bring about the definite results that were brought about in the last investigation.

Mr. TAWNEY. If it is the purpose of the Committee on Printing to make an investigation, would the gentleman have any objection to my changing the form of my amendment so as to require the Committee on Printing to make this investigation in connection with the Public Printer? My idea was in putting this responsibility on the Public Printer, and my reason for doing it, was the fact that I know this commission of which the gentleman is a member will expire, and the Public Printer has jurisdiction of these branches and is more familiar with their work than anybody else.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say to the gentleman that the members of this commission will go on with this work if authority is given.

Mr. TAWNEY. Has the gentleman any objection to my changing my amendment so as to include that?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. None whatever. I will say to the gentleman that I have an amendment here that I had intended to offer at the proper time, and if the gentleman will accept it as a substitute I will offer it now.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman send it to the desk and have it read for information?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I send the following substitute to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the substitute can be offered the point of order must be disposed of.

Mr. TAWNEY. Let the substitute be read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 4, page 169, as follows:

"SEC. 3. The authority vested in the Joint Commission to examine into the general subject of the public printing and binding of Congress and the various Executive Departments, authorized and appointed under the provisions of the act making appropriations to supply deficiencies, approved March 3, 1905, shall be continued in force during the term of the Fifty-ninth Congress, and the said commission is hereby directed to continue its investigations and report to Congress at its next session."

The CHAIRMAN. The only question before the House is the reservation of the point of order by the gentleman from Illinois. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. So much of the joint resolution authorizing the reprinting of certain documents to be sold by the superintendent of documents, approved March 28, 1904, as authorizes the Superintendent of Documents to order reprinted from time to time such public documents as may be required for sale, and the use of moneys received from the sale of public documents to reimburse the appropriation for printing and binding the cost of such reprinting, is hereby repealed.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that paragraph.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will only say a word in explanation of the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. MANN. I wish to make a point of order in the end, anyhow.

Mr. TAWNEY. The justification for the recommendation of the committee is that it appeared that the authority which the superintendent of documents now has is being grossly abused. He is exercising a privilege which no other governmental official possesses, the power of reprinting any edition of any public document he chooses, and he has done it.

Mr. MANN. What becomes of the volumes?

Mr. TAWNEY. He has the right to retain the proceeds of the sale of public documents in his possession for thirty days, and a scandal has grown out of that. As a result of that authority there has been an alleged defalcation, resulting in his dismissal, and this provision of law would make him deposit the proceeds every day with the Public Printer, instead of allowing him to keep them thirty days.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I understand the law is now for the superintendent of documents to reprint a document where it is for sale. I do not see anything here about twenty-four hours or thirty days.

Mr. PERKINS. That is in the next paragraph.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. While the law provides that the settlement shall be made at the end of every month, it is the practice now to make the settlement every week.

Mr. TAWNEY. That provision is a part of section 11.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but we are taking this up by paragraphs. I made the point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter all moneys received by the superintendent of documents from the sale of documents shall be returned to the Public Printer at the close of business each day and be by him covered into the Treasury.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding, I did not intend to make the point of order on the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Indiana when it was offered, but it was read from the desk simply for information in lieu of the paragraph offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, upon which a point of order was made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman. The gentleman offered it as an amendment to the paragraph; the paragraph having gone out on a point of order, there was nothing to amend.

Mr. MANN. I understand the position of the Chair, and I wish the gentleman from Indiana would offer it now.

Mr. TAWNEY. He can get it through as a joint resolution.

Mr. MANN. He can; but he can also have it put in here.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I would like to inquire of the Chair if paragraph 7 has been disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; both paragraphs of section 7 have been disposed of.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I would offer now the amendment which was read for the information of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment in the nature of a new section.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order to that.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I would say that if the gentleman from Minnesota is going to object to that amendment, I shall not offer it, because I am not seeking this additional work. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will so modify his amendment continuing the life of this Commission so as to expressly provide that this Commission shall investigate this subject of branch printing offices, as I endeavored to direct the Public Printer to do, I shall withdraw the point of order.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I will accept the suggestion of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman kindly embody it in his amendment, so that the Clerk can get at it?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will; and offer it as an amendment, as an additional paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman that it better be offered now as a new paragraph, because it might not be germane later.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I would ask that the paragraph be passed without prejudice.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana may be permitted to perfect his amendment, and that when perfected we may return to this place in the bill, and go on in the meantime.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to return later to this portion of the bill for the purpose of the gentleman from Indiana offering an additional section. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. So much of chapter 187 of the laws of 1895 (28 Stat., p. 843, at page 848) relative to the employment of counsel to protect the interests of the Treasury Department in cases before the Board of General Appraisers is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"The Attorney-General shall, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, appoint a solicitor of customs and such assistants as the Secretary may deem necessary, to protect the interests of the Treasury Department in all cases and matters before the Board of General Appraisers; and said solicitor and his assistants shall, whenever so directed by the Secretary of the Treasury, appear in the circuit courts and circuit courts of appeals of the United States in any cases appealed from said Board of General Appraisers and take such part in the management, conduct, and trial of such cases, in conjunction with the United States attorneys, as such solicitor or his assistants may deem advisable.

"The salary of said solicitor shall be $5,000 per annum, and of said assistants not to exceed $3,000 each per annum, to be fixed by the Attorney-General, and all of said salaries shall be paid out of the general appropriation for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out line 12 and following lines on page 169 and first five lines on page 170 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Attorney-General shall, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, appoint a solicitor of customs and such assistants, not to exceed three, as the Secretary may deem necessary to protect the interests of the United States in all cases and matters before the Board of General Appraisers; and the said solicitor and his assistants shall, whenever so directed by the Secretary of the Treasury, appear in courts of the United States in any cases appealed from said Board of General Appraisers and take such part in the management, conduct, and trial of such cases as the Attorney-General may deem advisable.

"That the salary of said solicitor shall be $5,000 per annum, and of said assistants not to exceed $3,000 per annum, to be fixed by the Attorney-General, and all of said salaries shall be paid out of the general appropriation for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

"That said solicitor and assistants shall be appointed without compliance with the conditions prescribed by the act entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service," approved January 16, 1883, and amendments thereof."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that this amendment is simply a bill of the House passed unanimously within the last ten days. It is something that is recommended very urgently by the Treasury Department and also by the Board of General Appraisers of the city of New York.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Who has been performing these duties heretofore?

Mr. PAYNE. There has been heretofore an assistant appointed by the Attorney-General, who performed part of the duties. He appears before the General Appraisers in customs cases there. I think he is appointed by the Secretary on the nomination of the Attorney-General. He appears simply before the Board of Appraisers, and he can not go into the courts and can not represent the United States when cases are there on appeal. This allows him to go into the courts, and being familiar with the cases of course he can try them there, and he will have knowledge of them. They now come under the jurisdiction of the assistant district attorney, who knows nothing of the cases and of the facts that have been previously developed.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. This amendment will permit him to pursue the remedy which he began?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, just a word. This provision, which is offered as a substitute for that carried in the bill, is almost identical with the bill which the Ways and Means Committee reported, and is inserted here at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Committee on Ways and Means wanting to make some change, we are perfectly willing to accept their views.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That all sums appropriated by this act for salaries of officers and employees of the Government shall be in full for such salaries for the fiscal year 1907, and all laws or parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. PARKER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to move to strike out, in lines 7 and 8, section 12, the words:

And all laws or parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from New Jersey to withhold his motion until I offer a new section at the end of the bill.

Mr. PARKER. That is perfectly agreeable.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey withholds his motion. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 173, after line 8, insert:

"SEC. 13. No act of Congress hereafter passed shall be construed to make an appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States or to authorize the execution of a contract involving the payment of money in excess of appropriations made by law unless such act shall in specific terms declare an appropriation to be made or that a contract may be executed."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would like to inquire of the gentleman why he has made it apply to legislation hereafter? Why not apply it to all legislation?

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, I do not suppose we could affect legislation heretofore enacted.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly you can affect legislation heretofore enacted. You may not affect legislation hereafter enacted and——

Mr. TAWNEY. I have no objection at all to making it apply to all previous enacted laws.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Of course in legislation hereafter enacted the last expression governs.

Mr. TAWNEY. The purpose of this——

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I think the proposition is right.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I was just going to suggest that I think the language in the bill is better than the language intimated by the gentleman from Maine. If the word "hereafter" were not included in this provision it would apply exclusively to one year to this particular bill. By expressing it "hereafter" it makes it permanent law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree with the lawfulness of the proposition laid down by my friend from Indiana. I do not think "hereafter" has anything to do with the permanency of law enacted by Congress. It depends upon what it means. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota whether it is intended by this proposition, by the word "hereafter," to confine this to legislation enacted hereafter?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; or——

Mr. MANN. Or to simply state hereafter as a matter of time. It seems to me that as the amendment reads, it provides that no contract can be entered into——

Mr. TAWNEY. Unless expressly authorized.

Mr. MANN. Unless expressly authorized, so that the word "hereafter" cuts no figure in the case whatever.

Mr. KEIFER. It prevents its affecting contracts that have already been made by him.

Mr. MANN. There are no contracts made heretofore.

Mr. KEIFER. I suppose there were under last year's appropriations.

Mr. MANN. This question arose on a point of order which I made the other day. Now, I have no objection, as far as I am concerned, to absolutely stating no contract shall be entered by an official of the Government unless it is authorized expressly or unless appropriation is made to cover it, but if that is done in this case, we must recur to the paragraph of the bill where the authority was stricken out. If the gentleman will ask unanimous consent to recur to that paragraph and insert that part that was stricken out on my point of order, I am perfectly willing then to let his go in with that understanding.

Mr. TAWNEY. I certainly will be willing to do that, because we want the Secretary of the Treasury to go on and make contracts.

Mr. MANN. I want that done first; somebody else may object to it. I think the section to which the gentleman offered an amendment preventing the Secretary of the Treasury from entering into a contract, which he now has authority to do——

Mr. TAWNEY. I will ask, Mr. Chairman, that the Clerk report the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. MANN. That is perfectly satisfactory, and I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the point of order. The gentleman from New Jersey has moved an amendment, to strike out the last two lines.

Mr. PARKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS] desires first to be heard, and I will yield to him.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS] to withhold his request to return until after the gentleman from New Jersey has concluded.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I understand the gentleman from New Jersey desires to make a speech.

Mr. PARKER. I desire to occupy about five minutes. Will the gentleman from Indiana now proceed?

Mr. TAWNEY. I would say, Mr. Chairman, that the Chair has not yet put the motion on the amendment which I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. That is quite true. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we may return to section 7, as per agreement, and I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent has been granted. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after line 4, page 169, as follows:

"SEC. 3. The authority vested in the Joint Commission to examine into the general subject of the public printing and binding of Congress and the various Executive Departments, authorized and appointed under the provisions of the act making appropriations to supply deficiencies, approved March 3, 1905, shall be continued in force during the term of the Fifty-ninth Congress, and the said Commission is hereby directed to continue its investigations and report to Congress at its next session. And the said Commission is hereby directed to inquire into the necessity for the continuance of the various branch printing offices and printing offices maintained in the various Executive Departments, bureaus, or independent offices of the Government, and to report what economies, if any, would be effected in the abolition of these printing offices or branch printing offices and the execution of the work now performed therein in the Government Printing Office."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania reserves the point of order.

Mr. MANN. What does this Commission consist of?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. This Commission consists of three members of the Senate and three Members of the House.

Mr. MANN. When it works, is not there some expense connected somewhere with the work?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. There have been the actual expenses of the members of the Commission.

Mr. MANN. There is no provision here in this amendment for paying them. Is it covered by something else?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. There is in the original act passed last year.

Mr. MANN. Will this continuation of the Commission carry with it the authority to expend the money?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. It would.

Mr. MANN. Well, it is the gentleman's lookout. I doubt it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] insist on his point of order?

Mr. MAHON. No. I did not understand it. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS].

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 86, where I desire to offer an amendment, after line 23.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to return to page 86 and offer an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 86, after line 23, insert as a new paragraph the following:

"For reconstruction of bridge and viaduct between the city of Rock Island and Rock Island Arsenal, Ill., $125,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. TAWNEY. I think, in view of the large amount asked for, there ought to be a statement made as to the necessity for the appropriation. It is due, I think, to the committee to know that the War Department has been advised within the last few days that the bridge at Rock Island is in such condition that it has become necessary for the Department to condemn it and close it against all heavy traffic, and this amendment is very essential, because it is a bridge that connects the Rock Island Arsenal and the Illinois shore, and it is a Government bridge. That is the reason for this request.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I have one other amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 23, in line 2, after the word "office," insert: "Provided, That no other part of the sum appropriated in this paragraph for the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be expended for printing."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must first obtain unanimous consent to return to that page and section.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask unanimous consent. It is very necessary, in view of the allotment that has been made by the Printing Committee and accepted by the Committee on Appropriations. This amendment is absolutely necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] asks unanimous consent to return to page 23 and offer an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk having reported the amendment, the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will again be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk reread the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. I can explain to the gentleman from Illinois. The Commission have heretofore had $15,000 for printing outside of Washington. Now, of the allotment that has been made for the purposes of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in that amount is included the amount which has heretofore been appropriated for separately. The Committee on Printing made this recommendation to the Committee on Appropriations, and we accepted it, for the reason that if this was not done, then they get $15,000 in addition to the allotment.

Mr. MANN. I have no desire to interfere with any reform of my distinguished friend from Minnesota; and I have no doubt very likely this is correct; but the law imposes on the Interstate Commerce Commission the duty of having certain printing done. If they do not do that printing, they fail to obey the law. Now, I do not know whether you have provided them with enough money in this appropriation. I want to be satisfied on that point. I want the printing done.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say the allotment made to that Department is all they have asked for. Heretofore their printing has been paid—the printing here in the city—out of the general appropriation of that Department for that Bureau.

Mr. MANN. What is the use of the item in the bill at all, then?

Mr. TAWNEY. Why, we have now allotted to them out of the general appropriation for printing just the amount they say they will need, including the $15,000 heretofore expended outside of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, though I regret I do not understand it, I will take the gentleman's statement that they give enough money for this. That is all I am looking out for.

Mr. TAWNEY. We give them all they asked, and if they have not enough it is their fault.

Mr. MANN. They ought to be satisfied with that; I have never found them fail to ask.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to inform the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from Illinois that there is still an item pending with reference to an appropriation for paving around the post-office at Chicago.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, there are various items pending upon the same proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey has been recognized.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PARKER. The "gentleman from New Jersey" is quite willing to yield the floor for the present.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the provision on page 16 which was passed over. There was considerable controversy between the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee, as to this item: "Toward the construction of a steam vessel especially fitted for and adapted to service at sea in bad weather, for the purpose of blowing up or otherwise destroying or towing into port wrecks, derelicts, and other floating dangers to navigation." The gentleman from Illinois made the point of order to line 19 to 22, inclusive, and the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from Illinois were to arrive at some conclusion about the matter, and it was then passed over without prejudice.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is a fact; I recollect it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that went out on a point of order. The Chair is informed that it went out of the bill on a point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. The RECORD shows that it was passed without prejudice. The gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Minnesota said they would agree to return to it. It was passed over so that they could see if they could agree about the matter. I think the gentleman from Illinois will agree with me about that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recollects the proposition was made to pass it over without prejudice, but objection was made. The Chair feels sure he sustained the point of order to that section.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That certainly is a mistake as to the RECORD. That is not the record. The Chair had distinctly intimated the intention to sustain the point of order to that part of the section, but on a second suggestion it was passed over without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. That is directly contrary to the recollection of the Chair. The Chair very distinctly recollects it.

Mr. MANN. The Chair sustained the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. It was reserved to go back. It was first sustained and then passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is confusing this with the paving around the post-office.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair remembers very distinctly sustaining the point of order, and discussing it afterwards with the members of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Chair sustained the point of order as to the paragraph printed in the bill, whereupon I offered an amendment changing the amount from $100,000 to $250,000, and at the suggestion of the gentleman from Minnesota it was passed over without prejudice. The chairman of the committee stated, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] agreed to the statement, that when he returned to it they would make an arrangement or come to some understanding subsequently about the matter.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I think the committee would save time by returning to this paragraph and discussing just what the status of it is.

Mr. MANN. If the Chair will pardon me, I think I can clear the mind of the Chair on this question. The point of order was made to the proviso, and the point of order was sustained by the Chair. Thereupon the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] moved to increase the amount——

Mr. BARTLETT. That is it.

Mr. MANN. From one hundred to two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and at the request of the gentleman from Minnesota the amendment was passed over, so that we might ascertain whether it was necessary to increase the amount in order that any contract might be entered into at all.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have just stated that to be the position.

Mr. MANN. I did not understand the statement of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] asks unanimous consent to return to the paragraph on page 16, for the purpose of perfecting it. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the paragraph and amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that an amendment increasing the amount from $100,000 to $250,000 is pending.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; I offered it.

Mr. TAWNEY. I asked that that amendment go over until there could be some further investigation as to whether it was necessary to do that in order that a contract for the full limit of cost might be entered into.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to engage the attention of the gentleman from Georgia——

Mr. BARTLETT. I will listen.

Mr. MANN. It is unnecessary to increase the amount of the appropriation. The $100,000 is all that can be expended in the ensuing fiscal year, and I have here a letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury, which letter I ask to insert in the RECORD, stating that under the act authorizing the construction of an ocean-going tug the Department can enter into a contract for the full amount of $250,000 whether there be any appropriation made this year or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the letter.

Mr. MANN. I just ask to have it inserted in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to insert the opinion of the Comptroller of the Treasury in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 8, 1906.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
Representative in Congress.

SIR: You submit for my consideration public bill No. 159, as follows:

"An act to provide for the removal of derelicts and other floating dangers to navigation.

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to have constructed, at a cost not to exceed $250,000, a steam vessel specially fitted for and adapted to service at sea in bad weather, for the purpose of blowing up or otherwise destroying or towing into port wrecks, derelicts, and other floating dangers to navigation, said vessel to be operated and maintained by the Revenue-Cutter Service under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

"Approved May 12, 1906."

In response to your verbal request for my opinion as to whether the above-quoted bill carries with it authority for the Secretary of the Treasury to have constructed by contract or otherwise the vessel provided for therein, in the absence of a specific appropriation for the same, I have to say that I have no doubt whatever that under that act the Secretary has ample authority to enter into contract or otherwise to have the vessel constructed.

Respectfully, R. J. TRACEWELL, Comptroller.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, I ask that the amendment be withdrawn.

Mr. BARTLETT. I offered the amendment, as I stated at the time, as a matter of precaution and safety, recognizing that this was a most important provision for the commerce on the Atlantic coast. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] differed so radically about the meaning of the section that when the point of order was sustained I offered the amendment. But now that the information has been obtained, and with the statement from the Comptroller of the Treasury, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent now to return to page 56, to offer a pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to return to page 56 for the purpose of offering a pro forma amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 56, in line 4, after the word "cook," insert "at $600."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, we will return to the item of the Chicago paving.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer as a substitute for the amendment which I proposed the other day the amendment which is at the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has the amendment, but the page where it is to be inserted is not stated.

Mr. OLMSTED. Where does it go in?

Mr. MANN. On page 3, at the end of line 4, as an amendment to that paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend on page 3, after line 4, by inserting the following:
"For repair of paving laid by and for the United States adjacent to the said building, $15,000."

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against this amendment that it is not authorized by existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that, inasmuch as the gentleman from Illinois had a previous amendment pending, unanimous consent is necessary to withdraw that and offer this. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I make the point of order that this is not authorized by existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of order. Does the gentleman desire to be heard?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the laws of Illinois provide that where land is platted a record of the plat shall operate to vest in the municipality in trust for the public the fee-simple title to the streets and other public places. Upon the assumption that the land in the vicinity of the Chicago post-office was platted by some one, the fee-simple title to the streets surrounding the post-office is in the city of Chicago in trust for public use. The act of the legislature of Illinois which has been called to the attention of the Chair vacates the streets and alleys crossing the Government grounds. One of these streets, as I understand it, was that street which extends from east to west opposite the center of this buildng and immediately north of the Great Northern and Majestic hotels. One of the alleys referred to, as I understand it, was the alley that runs in the rear of the Monadnock Block. The vacation in question had nothing whatever to do with the streets around the outside of the Government property in the city of Chicago. While it is true that an appropriation is in order to carry on an existing work, or to repair a work of the Government, it would scarcely be contended by the gentleman fom Illinois that if the Government should erect a building on a certain site and then convey the building and grounds, the fact that the Government had erected that building would make it in order on this bill to carry an appropriation for the repair of that building which had been constructed by the Government but to which the Government no longer had any title.

If then the Government of the United States, in the streets in the city of Chicago, the fee simple title to which was in the city of Chicago in trust for the public, put down any paving, the Government of the United States instantly ceased to have any title whatever to that paving. The instant that paving was attached to the real estate it became the property of the city of Chicago in trust for the people of Chicago, because it became a part of the real estate, and it is no more in order to move to add to this bill an appropriation for the repair or replacing of that pavement, which belongs to the city of Chicago, than it would be in order to put upon this bill an appropriation for the repair of a building or structure which had once belonged to the United States and which had subsequently been sold and conveyed by the United States.

The Government of the United States can not prevent the city of Chicago from taking up and carting away this pavement in the streets. Everywhere where the cost of paving has been assessed wholly against the adjacent property owners the city owns the pavement and can remove it at its pleasure, and he who adds to the real estate of another can not prevent the other from removing the improvement at his pleasure.

When the United States spent its money paving the streets, the title to which was vested in the city of Chicago in trust for the public, the pavement became the paving of the city of Chicago, and not the pavement of the Government of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, this is an important question, because substantially everywhere in the United States where public buildings exist pavements have been laid about those buildings. Scarcely anywhere have we a public building in a place that does not require paving in the streets about it. All the cities in the United States have been compelled for years to pay for this paving. It is indeed an important thing, if true as claimed, that because the people of the United States donated to Chicago the pavements around the public buildings when we refused to donate pavement to anybody else we have suddenly become liable for the continuance and maintenance of that pavement in a state of repair, and yet that is the effect of the contention of the gentleman from Illinois. I submit that the title to this pavement having passed from the Government of the United States it is no longer in order to move to appropriate money in this bill for the repair or replacing of that pavement, as it might be if the title had remained in the Government of the United States.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment of my own pending on page 4, which was passed without prejudice. I think the gentleman from Iowa has misconstrued the law upon which it is sought to make the adjoining property owner liable for pay. It is not on the idea that the adjoining property owner has any right or title to the streets or any title to the pavement in the streets. The law for the pavement of the streets of the city where I live, Macon, by the authorities of the city requires that the pavement shall be paid for in this way: One-third of it shall be paid for by the city and the other two-thirds by the property owners, one-third on each side of the street. It so happens that the Government of the United States owns a lot and building of 200 feet or more on which it pays.

The property owners on the side opposite to the Government building have paid one-third of this paving. The amendment which I offered provides that the United States Government shall pay the third of the pavement like other property owners. This matter has been presented by myself to the Treasury Department. I have submitted it to the Supervising Architect of the Treasury. He declined to pay it as a matter of course, because he did not feel that he was authorized by law to pay it and had no funds provided for paying such claims. I offered the amendment when this item in this bill was read, and it is now pending. The amount I desire to correct from $2,000 to $1,078.76. I did not at the time have before me the exact amount and merely placed the figure from memory, but have from the mayor of Macon the exact figures. I ask unanimous consent to amend my amendment by striking out the words "two thousand" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one thousand and seventy-eight dollars and seventy-six cents," and that the amendment be considered as pending in that shape.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment as suggested. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question. Is the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia an original proposition, a proposition originally to pave, or is it to repair a pavement already constructed by the United States?

Mr. BARTLETT. To pay for one-third of the pavement in front of the property of the United States. In other words, to have the United States Government pay its proportion of the cost of the pavement in front of and adjacent to the property owned by the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the United States already paved any part of it?

Mr. BARTLETT. Not a particle.

The CHAIRMAN. Then this is an original proposition?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Not a proposition to repave there?

Mr. BARTLETT. No, sir. This is an original proposition. The pavement does not need any repair, having been made some two or three years ago by the city in pursuance to the laws of the State of Georgia. The whole proposition is to ask that this amount of money, $1,078.76, be appropriated on this item to pay the proportion that the United States property owes for paving the streets adjacent to and in front of that property. There is nothing with reference to the repair of the pavement. The United States Government never has paid anything for the pavement. I know that to be the fact, because I have the papers and submitted them to the supervising architect of the Treasury, and I have a statement from the mayor of the city in my hand which gives the amount and the facts upon which this appropriation is asked.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I propose is an amendment to the paragraph providing that "the appropriation made in the urgent deficiency bill approved February 27, 1906, for improvements and changes of a general nature, is hereby made available also for the interior decoration of the building." That paragraph in the bill was itself subject to a point of order as new legislation, so that if the amendment which is proposed is germane to the paragraph, it is in order irrespective of the question as to whether it would be in order as a distinct proposition by itself.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman please restate that proposition?

Mr. MANN. The amendment which I propose is an amendment to the paragraph itself, subject to a point of order as new legislation, so that if the amendment which I propose is germane to the paragraph, it is in order whether as a new proposition it would be in order or not. That paragraph provides in reference to improvements and changes of a general nature. The appropriation for that work is also made available for the interior decoration of the building. The original appropriation was for improvements and changes of a general nature, and being before the House on this appropriation bill, it seems to me it would still be open to any amendment which was germane to that improvement.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman pardon me in order to clear up his position? This amendment to which the gentleman's amendment is offered simply provides that certain funds which are described by reference may be used for decorating this building. Why does the gentleman claim that an appropriation for decoration of the Chicago post-office is not in order on this bill?

Mr. MANN. Well, it is perfectly plain that this is legislation changing an appropriation. Probably an appropriation for the decoration would be subject to a point of order, but if it were not it is subject to a point of order to say that a previous appropriation shall be diverted from something else and applied to decorations. However, Mr. Chairman, I also contend that this proposed item is in order as an original item in the bill, if so offered.

The other day I called the attention of the Chair to the fact that this paving was laid by the United States under an appropriation made in 1880, expressly providing for the paving, and I shall insert in the RECORD, with the permission of the committee, a letter from the Supervising Architect giving the various appropriations for the Chicago post-office included within the original limit of cost and providing for an appropriation for paving. The appropriation for paving was carried by the general deficiency bill of June 16, 1880. Also, a letter from the Supervising Architect stating that under the act of June 16, 1880, providing for the pavement, there was paved by the Government with sandstone blocks one-half of the roadways on Clark, Dearborn, Adams, and Jackson streets, surrounding the building, and it is for the repair of that work done by the Government that this item is proposed. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa says that this is an item on the same footing as though the building had been sold by the Government. I deny it. In the first place, let it be understood that whatever title the Government has to the sidewalk space it has to the street space. Under the law of Illinois, if the Government has any title to the sidewalk it has the same title to the roadway. It has precisely the same title to one part of the street that it has to the other part of the street. The Government has improved the sidewalk space. It has laid a sidewalk there, and not only that, but it has machinery laid under the sidewalk, and one of the items, I call to the attention of the Chair, for which the urgent deficiency appropriation was made referred to in this paragraph was for machinery and improvements under and in the sidewalk space of the streets. The title was the same to that that it was to the balance of the streets. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the gentleman from Iowa will contend that the Government can in no case make improvements even upon property which it does not own, but before discussing that for a moment I wish to say I have no doubt that the gentleman from Iowa is thoroughly familiar with the law of real estate as relating to streets in the State of Iowa, but his statement about the law of Illinois is erroneous.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I beg the gentleman's pardon, Mr. Chairman. I went and carefully examined the Revised Statutes of the State of Illinois, and found the provision I have cited here in the Revised Statutes of the State of Illinois.

Mr. MANN. That is very true, Mr. Chairman, but the gentleman did not go far enough and examine the decisions of the supreme court of Illinois, which decided that provision of the Revised Statutes had no application to this portion of the city of Chicago. I do not wonder the gentleman made a mistake, because there it is in the Revised Statutes of Illinois, purporting to cover everything, but in these days it is sometimes necessary, in order to understand the law, not only to examine the Revised Statutes, but the decisions of the courts, and occasionally the debates of the legislative bodies.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The courts, I believe, have decided that legislative bodies are not to be considered in the construction of a statute.

Mr. MANN. Only the other day I heard the Supreme Court of the United States deliver an opinion referring exhaustively to debates taking place in this House as a reason for the opinion——

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And that ought to be, but I understand the rule to be otherwise.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman's opinion and the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States do not seem to go together in this case.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I think they do go together in this case. The gentleman and I differ as to what the opinion of the Supreme Court is on this subject. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman when this land was platted.

Mr. MANN. It was done probably before I was born.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. That is not very definite.

Mr. MANN. Probably, then, it was before the gentleman from Iowa was born.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. And even that is not very definite. Mr. Chairman, could the gentleman give me any idea when this land was platted?

Mr. MANN. It was platted, I will say to the gentleman, long before this provision was put in the Revised Statutes, and I do not know when this land was platted.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This statute was enacted in 1845.

Mr. MANN. The land was platted at this place before that time. This is one of the oldest parts of the city of Chicago. Now, Mr. Chairman, on the other point, as to whether the Government of the United States can in any case make and repair improvements upon property which does not belong to it, I call your attention to this proposition: The light-houses of the country are often situate upon a piece of property owned by the Government which has no egress or ingress so far as lawful permission is concerned. In many cases there are no streets leading to the light-house. The same is true of life-saving stations. In many cases the Government does improve out of the funds for light-houses and life-saving stations—necessarily improve, economically improve—pathways or other ways for getting to those establishments upon property which it does not own. Now, will it be contended that as to those improvements—improvements which the Government makes with the consent of the owner of the property without the objection of anybody—it can not repair that improvement, and that if it can repair it Congress has no control over the question, but must leave it solely to the Executive to repair it out of the general funds? I do not think the gentleman from Iowa will contend that, because if he did, and that should become the policy of the Government, it would be more expensive than paving around Federal buildings, because it would require the Government to own the right of way to all of its life-saving stations and to its light-houses which are situate not on roads, but off on the seashore where there are no roads leading to them.

I think it clear that the Government has the right. The other day, Mr. Chairman, in this body, on the consideration of this identical bill, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] either offered or supported an amendment for improvements in Cuba to mark places where our soldiers lost their lives. Located where? Upon property owned by the Government? Not at all; not even owned by American citizens. That appropriation went into the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It went out of the bill.

Mr. MANN. The point of order against the appropriation was overruled, I will say. The Chair said that the item was in order, although it was an appropriation to continue a work in a foreign country upon land not owned by the Government at all. And while it is true that that point was not raised, it would be a reflection upon the Committee on Appropriations, which I will not make, if I should say that they thought it was good and did not make it. At that time they knew that it was not subject to a point of order on that ground, and although they urged every other ground which they could think of they did not urge that.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It may be possible, if the gentleman will permit me, that the Committee on Appropriations has more regard for places where soldiers fell in Cuba than it has for the ground around the Chicago post-office.

Mr. MANN. I can not say that that is proved, because, while they did not raise the point of order, they voted the amendment down. I have been taught to believe that gentlemen in charge of a bill who wish to defeat a proposition always raise a point of order on it if they can think of a point of order, and very often raise one when they can not think of a point of order. If they had not known that the amendment was in order, they would have raised the point. I contend, very briefly, Mr. Chairman, that this item would be in order as an independent proposition, although it is offered as an amendment to another proposition; and if it be not in order as an independent proposition, it is in order as germane to a proposition itself originally out of order relating to the same subject-matter.

I append herewith the following letters:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 20, 1906.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Referring to our conversation of yesterday relative to the Chicago old custom-house and subtreasury building, and particularly to your reference to the fact that the Government paid for certain paving of the street surrounding said building, I have the honor to advise you that upon further investigation of the matter it appears from the records that the act of June 16, 1880, did provide for certain paving at the building named. For your information I give herewith a statement of the various acts for the site and construction of said building:

Act of March 3, 1875, appropriates	750,000.00
Act of March 3, 1877, appropriates	400,000.00
Act of April 30, 1878, appropriates	100,000.00

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 9, 1906.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives United States.

SIR: In connection with your recent visit to this office, I have the honor to advise you in relation to the paving of roadways on each side of the post-office, court-house, etc., building, Chicago, Ill.

Act approved June 16, 1880, on account of this building, appropriated $125,000 for completion of building and approaches, "including steps, grading, sidewalks, and paving," and as a charge against this appropriation a contract was entered into for the supply of sandstone blocks on half of the roadways on Clark, Dearborn, Adams, and Jackson streets. This work was completed and payment authorized in October, 1881.

An exhaustive search has been made of the records of this office, but has failed to disclose any action taken by the United States Government making expenditures on account of changes of blocks since that time. As bearing upon this matter, find copy of Department letter addressed to you on May 22, 1897, and also copy of Department letter dated October 14, 1902.

Respectfully,

J. K. TAYLOR,
Supervising Architect.

CITY OF CHICAGO,
BOARD OF LOCAL IMPROVEMENTS,
January 17, 1906.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MANN: Your letter of January 12 to Commissioner of Public Works Patterson, in reference to the paving of the streets around the post-office, has by him been referred to this department. I beg to state that the records show the following condition in reference to the pavement around block 121, school section addition, etc., which is the legal description of the block upon which the post-office is situated. In 1879 Adams street was paved with wooden blocks, and block 121 (post-office) was assessed $945.70, and the assessment was paid by the United States Government. In 1887 the north half of Adams street in front of the post-office block was paved with granite blocks. The cost of this half of the street paving was assessed upon the property owners and no part upon the Government. In 1881 the east half of Dearborn street was paved with granite block. The cost of the same was assessed upon the property owners and no part upon the Government. In 1884 the west half of Clark street was paved with granite block, and no part of the improvement assessed against the post-office lot, and in 1887 Jackson street, now Jackson boulevard, was paved upon the south half of the street, and no assessment was made against the Government property.

You will observe that in all of these instances, except in the first case, where Adams street was paved with wooden block in 1879, the half of the street immediately abutting upon the Government property was eliminated from the assessment proceedings. While there is no record in the department to this effect, I am informed by people who have been connected with the department for the last twenty-five or thirty years that the Government itself paved its half of all of these streets and paid for the same. This is borne out also by the fact that Adams street, Clark street, and Dearborn street are now paved in front of the post-office with granite block, and they were not paved by the city under special assessment proceedings. The conclusion will naturally follow that the Government paved these streets by private contract. I am not conversant with the improvement of Jackson boulevard with asphalt, except that I do recollect the half block in front of the post-office property was not improved at the time that the balance of the street was paved, but whether or not it was later improved by the Government or by the park boards I do not know. In my opinion it would not be possible to or practicable to assess the other property surrounding the post-office building for the entire improvement of these streets, and I am very much in doubt as to the position the city would take in reference to paying for the same. This would be a matter entirely within the control of the finance committee, and it might be advisable that you take that part of the matter up with Alderman Bennett, the chairman of that committee.

If this does not contain all the information desired, kindly let me know and I will be glad to furnish it to you.

Yours, very truly,

JOHN A. MAY, Secretary.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 22, 1897.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 15th instant relative to paving the north half of Jackson street between Dearborn and Clark streets lying immediately south of the site of the post-office building, in Chicago, Ill., and suggesting that said expenditure might be paid out of the appropriation for "Court-house and post-office, Chicago, Ill.," I have to advise you that the appropriation for said building is not available for expenditures other than for the construction of the public building named upon Government property, and that unless Congress makes specific appropriation for the proposed improvement this Department is powerless to give consideration to a bill therefor.

The letter addressed you by the Department on this subject on the 6th instant is herewith returned.

Respectfully, yours, L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, October 14, 1902.

MY DEAR MR. MANN: I thank you for your letter of October 3, which has just reached my hands on my return to the city after an absence of several days. I have investigated the suggestion you make regarding an appropriation for paving that portion of the streets surrounding the Government building. I found that the Government has never done any paving whatever, and that the law does not authorize the expenditure of money for that purpose; otherwise I should be glad to take the matter up at once and have it pushed with all possible vigor.

As to the sidewalks, work is being done on those now as rapidly as possible, and as soon as they are ready for use they will be thrown open to the public. I understand that within two weeks the sidewalks on the Jackson boulevard and Dearborn street sides will be completed, and they will be immediately thrown open for traffic. All of the sidewalks should be completed not later than December 1. As soon as they are completed a low fence will be placed back near the building line of the building, and that will be replaced in time by the railing which is to be a permanent protection to the public from the area ways and light shafts.

I thank you for writing me, and shall be glad to cooperate with you to the best of my ability to secure prompt and efficient work on the whole structure. The new bids for the interior construction, I am informed, will be opened within a short time.

I inclose herewith some correspondence which was made public by the Department yesterday.

Very truly, yours,

L. M. SHAW, Secretary.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
906 Ashland Block, Chicago, Ill.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reads as follows:

For repair of paving laid by and for the United States adjacent to the said building, $15,000.

This amendment is different in character and rests upon a different basis from the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] and other amendments of like character, because the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia and others of like character that are pending are original propositions for paving around a public building, whereas the one submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is for the repair of a pavement previously laid by the Government. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that a proposition to pave originally is legislation, and manifestly subject to the point of order. The only question, therefore, is as to whether a proposition to repair a pavement already laid by the Government of the United States is legislation, or whether or not it is authorized by any existing law. If this proposition be in order, it rests upon one or two facts, if they be facts: First, that the Government of the United States owns the fee where this paving is sought to be done, or, secondly, that it is a "work in progress" within the meaning of our rule. When the proposition was first advanced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] the Chair was inclined to hold that it was in order because the Government of the United States owned the fee, that impression having been given the Chair by the reading of the cession made to this land by the State legislature of Illinois, which the gentleman at that time produced. A careful reading, however, convinces the Chair that it has no reference whatever to the street on which the paving was originally made, that is sought to be repaired, and presume that that contention is not made at this time by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. The Chair will pardon me. I will say that contention was never made by me, but has been made by Government officials at Chicago.

The CHAIRMAN. Which seems to be unfortunate for the Government under this language, as the Chair will read:

That in case there shall be any street or alley running through any lot or tract of land so purchased or acquired by the said United States for any of the purposes described in the said act therein set forth, all that portion of said street—

What street? Running through the block on which the building is erected—or alley, then such block or tract of land shall, upon the purchase of the same by the United States or the transfer of the same to the United States, by condemnation or otherwise, for any of the purposes aforesaid, be, and the same is hereby, vacated and closed, and the lots or tracts of land abutting upon such street or alley—

"Such" referring back to the street or alley running through this block on which the building has been erected—shall extend to the central line.

And so forth.

Manifestly, in the opinion of the Chair, having reference only to alleys and streets running through this block, then possessed by the Government on a part of which the public building was erected, and having no reference to the streets or alleys then originally paved and now sought to be repaired.

Mr. MANN. I think the Chair never caught the point that I made on that question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is quite willing to hear the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. That provision of the statute only referred to Old Quincy street and the alley. The statute contemplates the vacation of that street, and the Government assumed by the vacation of the street that the Government became the owner of the vacated Quincy street and the alley; and the Government obtained the title to those streets except as to the mere matter of right of possession by vacation; they had already obtained all the balance of the streets surrounding as going with the land.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands from this language that these streets on which this paving was done, now sought to be repaired, were not vacated in fact. These streets are in use now.

Mr. MANN. They were not vacated. The point is, that the Government and the legislature both recognized the fact that the title to the streets was in the owner of the property, subject to the street easement, and that the street easement was vacated, and the Government thereupon built the building through it and obtained the same title originally in the part of the street not vacated as it did to the part vacated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair undersands the proposition. The legal fiction is that the adjointing landowner owns to the middle of the street, owns subject to an easement. That is a legal fiction resorted to to prevent the fee from being in nubibus, or in the clouds, it being necessary in legal contemplation for it to vest somewhere or in somebody, and is only a legal fiction. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the Government does not own the fee for the purpose of this legislation to the center of the street.

Now, the only other proposition is that this is a "work in progress." The Chair is of the opinion that when the Government of the United States laid the paving in question, now sought to be repaired, that it did not do it because of any legal obligation resting upon it to do the paving, but that it was a mere gift to the city of Chicago, which had absolute control of the streets and alleys of that city; that it was a mere gratuity on the part of the Government to the city, and that the Government of the United States does not now have such an interest in that paving that it might prevent the city of Chicago from doing with it as it pleases. In other words, if the city of Chicago desired to take up that pavement, which was laid there by the United States, the United States Government has no such interest in that paving that it could enjoin the city of Chicago from taking it up, casting it aside, or doing with it as it pleased. Essentially the streets and alleys of the city are exclusively within the control of the municipality of the city of Chicago, and not in the United States Government.

Now, the gentleman has made another point, which was, that this proposed amendment which he has offered, even if it be subject to a point of order, is sought to be appended as an amendment to a clause which is itself subject to a point of order, and therefore takes his amendment from under the operation of the general rule.

The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that it has been frequently held that, while a paragraph changing existing law may be allowed by general consent to remain and, thus remaining, may be amended by any germane amendment; yet that this does not permit an amendment which adds general legislation. So that if his amendment be legislation, it is still subject to the point of order.

For these reasons the Chair is inclined to the opinion that this is not authorized by law, and is therefore subject to the point of order; and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have an amendment on page 4 that I want to dispose of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will sustain the point of order on the ground that that is a new proposition.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit me to make another suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want the Chair and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] to understand that this amendment is offered to that part of the bill which deals with the public building at Macon, Ga., so that it is germane to this section if it is in order.

I desire to add to what I have stated to the Chair, that the act of March, 1902, which authorizes the reconstruction and the additional work to be done on the Government building at Macon, Ga., contains these words:

For enlarging, improving, and extending the United States Government building at Macon, Ga.

And it also authorizes the purchase of additional land; and that reconstruction, remodeling, or to use the language of the act, "enlarging, improving, and extending" of the building is now in progress, for which $100,000 is appropriated by the section. So that we have a work in progress of remodeling, extending, and improving the public building at Macon, which is now in progress, the limit being fixed at $306,000, and we appropriate here $100,000 toward the completion of the project.

Now, this amendment proposes to pay $1,078.76 to the city of Macon, that has improved the property of the Government by paving the street, as I have heretofore stated.

That is all I desire to call the attention of the Chair to, and with that I am through.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia is not authorized by existing law, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to go back to page 86 of the bill, and offer the following as a new paragraph under the head of "War Department."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to offer the following as a new paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 4, page 86, insert:

"For the purpose of contributing to the expense of the national encampment of Spanish war veterans, to be held in the city of Washington, D. C., in October, 1906, the sum of $5,000, the same to be paid out on the order of the Secretary of the Treasury in payment of bills incurred to the expense of such national encampment, such sum to be immediately available."

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent?

Mr. KEIFER. I ask unanimous consent to go back to offer this amendment. It is subject to the point of order, but in view of the worthy purpose I hope no gentleman will make the point.

Mr. PAYNE. It is not only subject to the point of order, but requires unanimous consent to go back. I do not think we ought to put any such language in an appropriation bill.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow me for a moment?

Mr. PAYNE. If I remember correctly, there is one precedent of an appropriation for the Grand Army of the Republic, when the encampment was held here, but that was done by a joint resolution. It seems to me if this is to be done at all, it should be done in the same way, and not to put it in an appropriation bill and make a new precedent.

Mr. KEIFER. It has been done both ways.

Mr. Chairman, just a word on the subject, by unanimous consent. The Grand Army of the Republic, at its first national encampment, had an appropriation in all of about $90,000. It was not directly appropriated for expenses, all of it, but some of it was, and some of it was by way of fitting up parks and stands and work of that kind. The last Grand Army national encampment had in the same way an appropriation, as I am informed, of about $25,000. About $11,000 of it was in the way of fitting up grounds for the meeting places of the encampment, and so on.

Now, those are the precedents. The Spanish war veterans set about raising, in the city of Washington, the necessary money by private subscription, and they were just entering upon that at the time the earthquake came in California. Then the field was taken by those who solicited subscriptions for the purpose of relieving people in the city of San Francisco. People gave liberally to that, and after that the committees say that the people declined to give, because they had already given privately for the other purpose. Therefore this comparatively small appropriation is asked of Congress, and, following the precedent, I ask unanimous consent that it may be put in the appropriation bill here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to return to page 86 to offer the amendment which has been read.

Mr. PAYNE. Before that request is put to the committee, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for a minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know that I would object to it if it came up in the form of a resolution appropriating this money. There are several considerations that might lead me to yield to it; but I do not think we ought to put it in an appropriation bill. My recollection is that when a similar provision came up before for the Grand Army of the Republic it came up in the shape of a joint resolution. Therefore I must object to its coming in here in this way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that there were several paving amendments that were pending, and the Chair desires to say that his ruling on the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Georgia extends to the other proposed amendments.

Mr. TAWNEY. I had reserved points of order upon all of them.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to refer to a paving amendment which I obtained permission to offer the other day. Inasmuch as the ruling of the Chair has practically decided the question, and I think the ruling was right, I have no desire to offer my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I read the other day a part of a letter written by Mr. Holmes, and stated that I would print the letter as a part of my remarks. When I received the transcript of my remarks the letter was not with it having been mislaid. It was subsequently found, and I now ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to print the letter referred to in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. The following is the letter referred to as it was originally written and presented by me to Mr. Holmes and sent to him with his manuscript:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Washington, D. C., March 12, 1906.

DEAR SIR: The United States Senate recently passed a resolution asking the Secretary of the Interior for an expression of opinion concerning the continuance of the investigations of fuels and structural materials by the United States Geological Survey.

I am sending you herewith a copy of his report in response to this resolution, in which he recommends the continuance of these investigations, giving reasons therefor, and asks Congress to make an appropriation of $350,000 for this work during the next fiscal year.

The final report on the fuel investigations during 1904 is now ready for distribution (Professional Paper No. 48), and you can obtain free of charge a copy of this report by applying for it at once to some Member of Congress or the Director of the Geological Survey. If in writing for this report you feel sufficiently interested in this work to express an opinion as to its continuance, I am sure that any such expression of opinion on your part will be considered appropriate.

The report on the investigation of structural materials during the past year, and also the preliminary report on the fuel investigations during 1905, will also be published at some time in the near future, and copies of these reports should be applied for through the same channel.

I may add that these fuel and structural-material investigations will hereafter be conducted under an advisory board made up of representatives from the national engineering and allied societies, and on this board the mining engineers will have five representatives, Mr. John Hays Hammond, of New York; Mr. Robert W. Hunt, of Chicago; Mr. B. F. Bush, of St. Louis; Mr. Julian Kennedy, of Pittsburg, and Mr. C. S. Robinson, of Denver.

Very respectfully, J. A. HOLMES.

The following is the letter as photolithographed with marginal note as it appeared when it was returned, with direction on the margin to omit the sentence underscored:

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two lines, repealing all laws inconsistent with this bill. At the conclusion of what I have to say I shall ask the committee for unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject of the amendment which was adopted the other day, during my temporary absence, with respect to the Soldiers' Homes, prohibiting any part of the appropriation to be used in any Home which maintains a bar or canteen for the sale of intoxicating liquors.

I did not know that such an amendment was to have been offered or I should have been here at any cost, and I wish to say a word or two now.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment affords no opportunity for a fair vote in the House on the report from this committee.

Mr. TAWNEY. Right there I want to state to the gentleman that since the adoption of the amendment I am advised by the general treasurer of the board that it will be necessary for Congress to appropriate $200,000 for the maintenance of Homes more than otherwise would have been necessary.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to know for what purpose that is to be done.

Mr. PARKER. I hope gentlemen will not take up my time. Mr. Chairman, that amendment allows no fair vote in the House. Neither the Homes nor the Government want to maintain bars or canteens. "Canteen" and "bar" are not the right words. The soldiers in the Army and the old soldiers in the Homes have been maintaining solders' clubs, as they had a right to do, where they could have refreshment, a glass of light beer or light wine, in such moderation as shall not be intoxicating, as each man may in his own home, what every man in this House claims the privilege of doing. Under this amendment these soldiers' clubs, where the proceeds of the sales go for the common benefit into books, newspapers, and athletics, are to be taken away from the soldiers, and they are to be treated as mere children.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PARKER. If the gentleman will excuse me, I have but little time.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Fire away.

Mr. PARKER. I am going to fire away. Now, Mr. Chairman, this amendment was offered by the gentleman from Kansas. There is a Soldiers' Home in Leavenworth, Kans.; there is a prohibition against the sale of any sort of intoxicating liquors in the constitution of Kansas, and the Soldiers' Home is right by a town that is wide open with the sale of all sorts of intoxicating liquors. Old soldiers who insist on their right to a drink are to be forced and driven from their club into these unlicensed and unregulated saloons.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I do not see the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BOWERSOCK] here——

Mr. PARKER. The gentlemen from Kansas know what I am talking about. They know it is true. Now, I do not believe in treating old soldiers as mere children, as babies; but I do not believe in going to a vote on a question that is not the question before the House. The question is not one of selling liquor in a bar or canteen. It is that of the right of the soldiers' club to drink light beer and light wines in moderation in their own room. The clause should have been amended so as to apply to these soldiers' clubs, but it can not be done now. We can not have a debate or amendment of the provision on the floor of the House that is passed. We could only have a vote on the question whether Soldiers' Homes should maintain a bar for general sale of liquor. They do not want this. I do not want it. But, on behalf of the old soldiers, I desired then and I desire now to object to this tyranny over them. I always have been, and always expect to be, unflinchingly opposed to taking away from them the right to practice temperance in their own home, and prohibition is not temperance. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER. The post exchange in the Army was a soldiers' club, in which, like any other man, our boy in blue could obtain a drink of beer in moderation and decency. That post exchange was not created by general order. It grew out of necessities. An officer in the far West some sixteen years ago wanted to promote temperance among his men and to keep them away from the low haunts that surround a military post. He arranged that his men should club together, allowing the use of light wine and beer, and furnishing a room in which they could meet together, with a refreshment counter, newspapers, and a gymnasium, to enjoy some of the freedom that belongs to a man in private life, where those who know one another form their own club, so that they may be with friends, and drink, if at all, in decency and moderation. The institution grew. It proved its usefulness. It destroyed the prevalence of the pay-day spree. It reduced disease. It reduced drunkenness. It reduced desertion; for the most common case of desertion is when a man is tempted into some vile haunt, doped, and finds himself absent without leave when he comes to his senses, but is unwilling to go back and receive punishment and disgrace. It commended itself to every officer who had seen it.

It was unfortunate that the post exchange got the name of "canteen," a name which is associated in the minds of the older officers and of the public with an entirely different institution, namely, the sutler's canteen, where strong drink could be bought at will. There is a great deal in a name, and it is quite possible that the name alone was the cause of the prejudice which was raised throughout the Union against the soldiers' club; but the mischief was done when Congress invaded the Army, as it is now proposed to invade the government of the Soldiers' Home, taking away their right to govern themselves and attempting government by statute.

But this proposition goes away beyond any that has come before. One could understand the feeling of anxious mothers as to young men in the Army. It is hard to understand how they could wish to take away the comfort of an occasional drink of beer from the old soldiers of more than 60 years of age. Only enthusiasts could twist the facts as they have done. We are told to compare the statistics of drunkenness at Marion, Ind., in 1903, without beer in the Home, and in 1905, when they say beer was there. The fact is that the beer hall was not opened in Marion until January, 1906, so as to give only a few months' statistics, but statistics which show a large decrease in drunkenness after pension day since the beer hall was opened. Attempt is made to compare the record of the National Homes with the Soldiers' Home in Washington, the latter being confined to men of long service and good record, a large proportion being there because of service in the Regular Army during a period of twenty years of peace.

I add an appendix as to some of the statements made the other day in debate.

APPENDIX.

Memorandum relative to beer in the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

If the amendment to the sundry civil bill that provides that no part of the appropriation for the National home shall be available for Homes where any form of alcoholic beverage is sold should become a law, it would result in depriving members of the Home of much more than the privilege of obtaining light beer. The beer halls were originally established in the Homes as a temperance measure, and have in every Branch helped in the difficult task of maintaining sobriety and good order. They have done much more than this. They have become a feature of the Home, essential to the best interests of all members, irrespective of whether they individually use the beer sold in them or not.

Long experience has shown that a wide variety of amusements and comforts is essential to the happiness of the aged members of Homes. A disinclination to make new acquaintances is a characteristic of old age, and aged people when separated from their families and the friends of a lifetime, as the members of the Home necessarily must be, are peculiarly subject to that most distressing form of lonesomeness—lonesomeness in a crowd.

AVERAGE AGE OF MEMBERS 66 YEARS.

The whole influence of the beer halls in the Home is to counteract this tendency. They provide a meeting place, furnished with chairs, and tables, where new acquaintances can be easily made, and where, under the influence of cheerful social intercourse, the vague mental and physical aches of old age and possibly the depressing recollection of past failures can be, at least temporarily, forgotten.

The extent to which members would be deprived of advantages to which they have become accustomed, by the passage of this amendment, is shown by the fact that there was expended for their amusement and benefit during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, the sum of $199,835.46 from the post fund. Of this amount $131,691.45 was derived from the profits of the beer halls. This expenditure was for the maintenance of bands, theaters, clubhouses, billiard halls, card room, out-door games, deer parks, aviaries, the construction of shelters, and resting places about the grounds, monuments for the cemetery, vocal music for Sunday services in chapel and hospitals, and the purchase of newspapers and periodicals.

All of this is necessary, because at best life in an institution where human beings are crowded together is so unnatural and different from family life that special provisions for entertainment are essential to even a moderate degree of contentment. Life in barracks for aged idle people, unless relieved by attractive surroundings and some form of amusement or diversion, is so depressing that it tends to the development of melancholia, dementia, and suicide. It is therefore important that if this amendment becomes a law the appropriation for the National Home should be largely increased. There is not now time to prepare full estimates for this, although an estimate has been made of the increase necessary to permit of continuing the bands, which, however, are but one feature of the amusements now enjoyed. If so radical a change as the adoption of this amendment is insisted upon, at least one year's time should be allowed before it becomes operative to permit of adjusting the practices at the Homes to the change.

On page 8604 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for June 12, 1906, Mr. TIRRELL is quoted as follows:

"Now, I want to give an illustration, which is right in point in regard to this matter. There is a Soldiers' Home out in one of the Western States, at Marion—I think—Indiana, where until the last two years no canteen was maintained. A canteen was put into that Home two years ago, and the statistics show that crime and disorder have increased in that Home 25 per cent since the canteen was established there."

On page 8608 Mr. LITTLEFIELD is reported as stating:

"Now, I would like to call attention to the Marion Branch, Marion, Ind., for two years with a canteen and a year without a canteen. I will take 1903 * * * the total cases of discipline were 543; * * * in 1905, with the canteen, * * * the total cases of discipline were 737—that is, an increase of 33⅓ per cent."

These statements are entirely incorrect, because the beer hall was not opened at the Marion Branch until January 9, 1906. The figures used by Mr. LITTLEFIELD are taken from the report of the Marion Branch for the fiscal year 1905, which ended on the 30th of June, more than six months prior to the opening of the beer hall.

The governor of the Marion Branch reports that difference in cases of discipline referred to by Mr. LITTLEFIELD is due to local causes resulting chiefly from a State law and the attitude of the authorities of the city of Marion relative to it. So far as figures are available at the Marion Branch relative to the effect of the beer hall since it was opened, January 9, 1906, they indicate that its influence has been good. The total arrests for the ten days following the last quarterly payment of pensions prior to the opening of the beer hall was 64. The total arrests for the ten days following the quarterly payment of pensions next succeeding the opening of the beer hall was 42, a decrease of 34.3 per cent in arrests, which may be fairly attributed to the influence of the canteen at that Branch.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD compares reports of discipline of the Central Branch, at Dayton, Ohio; the Northwestern Branch, at Milwaukee, Wis., and the Eastern Branch, at Togus, Me., with those of the Soldiers' Home at Washington, and states that the men in the latter are older than the members of the National Home. The official reports for the year ending June 30, 1905, show the average age of inmates of the Soldiers' Home at Washington to be 59.01 years. The average age of members of the National Home for the same year was 65.12.

A comparison between conditions in the National Home and the Soldiers' Home at Washington is not fair, because of the great difference in the class of men admitted to the two institutions. At the Washington Home only men of good record, and, as a rule, of long service, are admitted, while in the National Home there is practically no restriction upon the admission of men who served during the civil war. The average length of service of inmates of the Washington Home is fourteen and four-tenths years. The average length of service of the members of the National Home is less than two years. The habits of sobriety, subordination, and good conduct acquired by members of the Regular Army during their long service would necessarily have its influence in connection with the discipline of the Home at Washington.

The majority of the members of the National Home are there because of disabilities and habits contracted in early life while living under the conditions resulting from active service in the field during a great war. The influence of war and its effect upon men engaged in it is too well known to need further comment in this connection. A very large proportion of the men in the Soldiers' Home in Washington are there because of twenty years' service in the Regular Army, during a period when there was no war. They are, therefore, as a whole, of a totally different class from the members of the National Home. The difference in the methods of discipline and reporting in the two institutions are also so great as to make any comparison between their statistics of little or no value.

Mr. TIRRELL is quoted as saying (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 8604): "No one can dispute the accuracy of this statement, and it never has been disputed, so far as I know," and quotes a statement of Mr. Adams, his partner, relative to the conditions at the Eastern Branch, at Togus, Me., as follows: "If a man had no pension, he was allowed 'tobacco and beer tickets.'"

Beer tickets have never been given to members by the Home, nor has beer ever been purchased with money appropriated by Congress, except in small quantities for use in the hospitals. Tobacco has been and still is issued to nonpensioners who use it.

At the Southern Branch, near Hampton, Va., the members were quarantined on account of yellow fever from July 31, 1899, until September 7, 1899. During the entire period of quarantine there were only two arrests, both minor offenses. Members had free access to the beer hall at this time, but could not visit the saloons outside of the grounds where strong liquor is sold. This is the lowest record of cases of discipline at any Branch of the Home. If the sale of beer at the Home was the cause of misconduct of members, as charged by Mr. LITTLEFIELD, it would certainly have been manifest at this time, when members were made restless and uncomfortable by being confined to the Home grounds. At the Eastern Branch, at Togus, Me., members are, to a partial extent, kept within the limits of the Home during the first three months of the calendar year on account of the severity of the weather and the depth of the snow. The number of cases of discipline is much smaller during this period, although the number of members present is always larger, than for the three months following, when the weather permits members to go outside to places where strong liquor is sold. For the ten years ending June 30, 1905, the average number of cases of discipline at the Eastern Branch for the quarters ending March 31 was 119; for the quarters ending June 30, 186, an increase of 56 per cent.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be adopted and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WATSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 19844—the sundry civil appropriation bill—and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment. If not, the vote will be taken on the amendments in gross. The question is on the amendments.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same with the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after line 2, on page 165:

"Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for materials and supplies which are manufactured or produced in the United States unless said articles are sold to the Isthmian Canal Commission at export prices whenever such export prices are lower than the price charged consumers in the United States."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, the amendment is the same as that offered yesterday in the Committee of the Whole. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if it is not the same as was offered in the Committee of the Whole on yesterday, and which was ruled by the Chair to be in order?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Substantially the same. It is the same in effect. It has the same legal effect.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this is a proposition that was considered in the Committee of the Whole, and that it is also new legislation and was considered and rejected by the Committee of the Whole. I also desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAWNEY. The previous question has not been ordered on the final passage of the bill. Is it now in order to move to recommit the bill until the previous question has been ordered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] on the point of order briefly.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the amendment is offered to that part of the appropriation bill which provides $9,032,814 for purchase and delivery of material, supplies, and equipment for the construction of the isthmian canal. The amendment is drawn in the form of a limitation upon the appropriation. It does not change existing law or make any addition to the permanent law. It applies to the appropriation carried in this bill, and to that only. If we have the power to deny this appropriation entirely, obviously we have the power to limit the appropriation or the manner in which it may be expended. It seems to me to be clearly a limitation upon the appropriation and not a change of law. I will say, in addition, that precisely the same question was submitted yesterday and ruled in order by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the gentleman is in error. The Chair is informed that the point of order was withdrawn, and that there was no ruling of the Chair in the Committee of the Whole. However, if there had been a ruling, it would not control the Chair, but of course would be considered by the Chair as an authority to be taken into consideration in deciding the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the point of order was not withdrawn yesterday. While it was withdrawn by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], it was renewed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER], so that the point of order itself was never withdrawn.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. That is my recollection, and I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the further fact that a similar limitation in the form of an amendment was adopted by the House upon the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER], confining the expenditure of the appropriation to the lock type of canal, that a point of order was made against that and overruled by the Chair. The principle involved in both cases is the same.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts in what respect this amendment differs from the one on page 8844 of the RECORD, which he offered yesterday in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. No change, in my judgment, except in the language used. The legal effect of it is exactly the same.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the difference in the language?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I have not a copy of the amendment.

Mr. TAWNEY. Your present amendment does apply to export prices, does it not?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. No.

Mr. TAWNEY. It mentions export prices.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. It mentions export prices; that does not change the principle involved.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the Clerk report the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Speaker, the proposition is the same under both amendments. The object sought by both of these amendments is to leave with the Isthmian Canal Commission the power which they now enjoy, to buy supplies for the construction of the canal in the cheapest markets. There is no provision of law now which compels them to discriminate in favor of American manufacturers and producers against manufacturers and producers in foreign countries. The amendment seeks to secure to the Isthmian Canal Commission the same free hand in purchasing its supplies that it has to-day. It makes no change in existing law.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I wish to suggest that the amendment now offered differs in some respects which may be material and important from any amendment which was offered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union yesterday, and particularly does it differ from the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts himself in committee and held in order by the Chairman. While the amendment which he offered yesterday was merely a limitation upon the appropriation itself, this amendment, if I correctly heard it as read by the Clerk, imposes upon the Isthmian Canal Commission, or those who purchase these supplies, an additional duty. The amendment yesterday which the gentleman offered provided that no part of the appropriation should be expended except as the result of bids advertised in the manner now established by the Isthmian Canal Commission under existing law—that is to say, it imposed upon them no duties except those already existing under present law. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, the consideration that this amendment would impose upon that Commission the duty, not now imposed under existing law, of inquiring and ascertaining the export prices of these materials, and to ascertain also the prices to American consumers, whether wholesale or retail prices not stated, in addition to receiving and opening bids. It imposes upon this Commission very arduous and important duties not imposed upon them by existing law, but which they would have to perform in order to comply with the terms of that amendment; and even those are not definite. It not only limits expenses or controls the appropriation, but in controlling it imposes the duties I have suggested.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Allow me to suggest to the gentleman it fixes a standard of prices for the purchase of material. There is nothing clearer than that. No Department officer could help but construe that to be legislation by Congress fixing the standard of prices for materials when no standard is fixed by the law, and it is pregnant with legislation. The Chair of course will look to the substance as well as the form in determining whether the proposition is in or out of order, and as the gentleman from Maine has suggested, if it accomplishes anything it accomplishes legislation, and if its interpretation is such that it must be given the legislative meaning as fixing a standard of prices it is in violation of the rule and practice of the House.

Mr. DALZELL. Let me suggest to the gentleman there is no standard of export prices that could be ascertained by the Commission.

Mr. OLMSTED. There is no standard of prices to the American consumer, and there are thousands of different varieties of articles to be purchased under this appropriation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the present practice and the present rule of the Commission under the existing law is that they can buy goods wherever the goods can be bought cheapest. There is no tariff against foreign goods upon the isthmian strip. Now, then, in order to determine who is the lowest bidder at present when a bid is offered from the United States and another from abroad the Commission determines which one of the two is the lower. Now, if the amendment stopped with the words "export prices," something of what has been just said might be well said, but it goes on to say "wherever these are lower than the prices charged the American consumer." Now, Mr. Speaker, the amendment is merely a provision that the Commission shall limit the amount when buying in our markets to the world's competitive price, because, of course, when our people sell abroad and fix an export price it is necessarily the world's competitive price. The only way that the Commission can determine what that competitive price is is by considering the bids submitted to the Commission. So that the language "export prices, when they are lower than," is simply, after all, when those prices are lower that any other prices. The gentleman says this amendment is unlike either of the amendments suggested yesterday. I submit, in the first place, it is in substance, though not in language, exactly the same as the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and then I submit it is in language even almost identical with the amendment submitted by me later on and voted down by the committee and entertained by the Chairman as being in order.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I wish to contribute something to the information of the Chair in order that he may make a just decision. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] has stated that there was no such thing as a standard of export prices. If that statement is in accordance with the facts, it has a material bearing upon the decision of this question. I desire to read the testimony of Mr. Shonts, the president of the Commission, and Mr. Ross, the purchasing agent of the Commission, in order to show that there is a standard of export prices and that these high and responsible Republican officials know that there is. Mr. Shonts says——

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the testimony of Mr. Shonts and the testimony of Mr. Ross before the Committee on Appropriations on this subject is not material and has no bearing on the point of order which is now under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears gentlemen on points of order. It is in the discretion of the Chair, and the Chair would not desire to cut off the gentleman from what he desired to say if it was fairly brief. The Chair would like to know if the gentleman has any statement to make concerning what the law now is?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Yes; I have; but if the Chair will indulge me one moment, I will read this testimony.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The testimony is as follows:

> Mr. SHONTS. I would favor buying in the open market for the reasons Mr. Ross has stated. I think the fact that we have that privilege enables us to get our American-made material cheaper. I think that the steel companies, to illustrate, give us the benefit of their export prices.
> Mr. ROSS. There is one other thing that I might have said. I do not know positively, as I said a while ago, that the United States steel export companies, for instance, would take advantage of us if we didn't have the right of foreign competition, but they do put our business on an export basis now. For instance, on steel rails—we have bought steel rails during the last year for $26.40 a ton delivered alongside a vessel at Baltimore, while the rate that they usually charge the railroads of this country was $28 at the mill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the law——

Mr. OLMSTED. Does the gentleman consider that is a standard rate?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I consider that if the veracity of responsible Republican officials is to be admitted, it is a standard rate, and I assume that the officials, who have spent $10,000,000 for supplies and are ready to contract for $10,000,000 worth more, know quite as much as the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the question as to whether there is a standard export rate.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman tell what the standard export rate of steel shovels is and how long it will remain the standard?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I do not know. I am simply quoting the general statement of the president of the Commission that the present law gives them the advantage of the export prices of American manufacturers. He did not go into detail and say that there were export prices for some articles and not for others. That statement was a general one, obviously comprehending all supplies which are needed in the construction of the canal.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania states that this amendment will impose a new duty upon the officers purchasing canal supplies. I assert that it imposes no duty upon them which does not rest upon them now. There is a duty upon them now imposed by their obligation to the American people to construct this canal at the lowest possible cost. To do so they must purchase their supplies wherever they can buy cheapest. In order to purchase cheapest they must ascertain what articles are sold for abroad and what the same articles are sold for at home—in the United States.

If they fail to do that now, they fail to discharge a duty which existing law places upon them. Now, the same obligation will rest upon them absolutely unchanged, unenlarged, if this amendment is adopted. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, there is no existing law that guides the Isthmian Canal Commission in the making of purchases. The fact is that the Secretary of War and the President believe that there is no law, and have asked Congress to pass a law to furnish a guide to the Isthmian Canal Commission on that subject. If there be no law, and we have the statement of the Secretary of War and the President to that effect, then this is a change of existing law, because it proposes to make a new law, and the making of a new law is a change of law.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. In reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if an officer of this Government fails to meet an obligation which the law puts upon him, namely, to buy supplies for the Government as cheaply as he can, and instead of discharging that obligation buys at a higher price than he is enabled to, I assert that he is guilty of a violation of law and of malfeasance in office.

Mr. DALZELL. I assert that there is no law.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. There is an unwritten law.

Mr. DALZELL. There is no United States law that fixes how the Isthmian Canal Commission shall purchase supplies for the construction of the isthmian canal.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. If an officer of the Government purchased supplies in the dearest market and not in the cheapest, I assert that that officer can be impeached for malfeasance in office, unless we direct him to purchase in the dearest market, as you gentlemen on the other side wish to have the law direct him to do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is prepared to rule. It is conceded that under the law as it is at this time these supplies may be bought anywhere, without regard to where they may be produced, whether in the United States or elsewhere in the world. Now, this is an appropriation for supplies and equipment for the construction and engineering and administration departments of the Isthmus of Panama, $9,000,000. The motion to recommit made by the gentleman from Massachusetts is as follows:

To recommit the bill with instructions to report the same back with the following provision: After line 2 of page 165:

"Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for materials and supplies which are manufactured or produced in the United States unless said articles are sold to the Isthmian Canal Commission at export prices whenever such export prices are lower than the prices charged consumers in the United States."

Gentlemen say this fixes a standard. It is not necessary for the Chair to discuss the merits of the measure. "Consumers in the United States." If the Chair was to discuss them, and it was a question of fixing a standard, would it be consumers by retail or wholesale?

The merits of the proposition are not involved in the point of order. What is the object of the motion and of the instruction? If it does not change existing law, then it is not necessary. If it does change existing law, then it is subject to the point of order. [Applause.] Much has been said about limitation; and the doctrine of limitation is sustained upon the proposition under the rule that, as Congress has the power to withhold every appropriation, it may withhold the appropriation upon limitation. Now, that is correct. But there is another rule, another phase of that question. If the limitation, whether it be affirmative or negative, operates to change the law or to enact new law in effect, then it is subject to the rule that prohibits legislation upon a general appropriation bill; and the Chair, in view of the fact that the amendment would impose upon officials new duties as to purchasing canal supplies, has no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the instructions are subject to the point of order for the reasons stated.

Mr. TAWNEY. I move to recommit the bill; and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry. Before the Chair passes finally upon the point of order I want to ask this question: Has the Chair any doubt that under existing law the Commission has already bought at export prices?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the Commission has plenary power now. Under the law as it now exists, after having asked a gentleman who he believes knows, and which he believes is not controverted, the Commission may buy supplies anywhere and of anybody.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then this only requires them to continue——

The SPEAKER. Now, then, it is a limitation, the Chair submits to the gentleman from Mississippi; limits that power, and in limiting that power legislates.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. TAWNEY. I move to recommit the bill, and upon that demand the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS (continuing). If they may do that now how is it a change of existing law? Has the Chair decided?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I respectfully appeal.

Mr. TAWNEY. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] to lay on the table the appeal of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] from the decision of the Chair.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 156, nays 69, answered "present" 12, not voting 143, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct about that. He was engaged as a member of the Committee on Rules, in session during the roll call, and could not be present in the House; but that does not bring the gentleman within the rule. The Chair would be glad to pair with the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Senate resolution No. 60.

Resolved, etc., That purchases of material and equipment for use in the construction of the Panama Canal shall be restricted to articles of domestic production and manufacture, from the lowest responsible bidder, unless the President shall, in any case, deem the bids or tenders therefor to be extortionate or unreasonable.

So the previous question was ordered.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

For the balance of the day:

Mr. REYNOLDS with Mr. HUNT.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois with Mr. LAMAR.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan with Mr. RUSSELL.

Mr. BARTHOLDT with Mr. GRIGGS.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado with Mr. MCLAIN.

Mr. BABCOCK with Mr. PUJO.

For the vote:

Mr. BURTON of Ohio with Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TOWNSEND). The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] is recognized for twenty minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, on the second day of the present month the Senate passed a resolution providing for the purchase of material and equipment for use in the Panama Canal. That resolution is in the following words:

That purchases of material and equipment for use in the construction of the Panama Canal shall be restricted to articles of domestic production and manufacture, from the lowest responsible bidder, unless the President shall, in any case, deem the bids or tenders therefor to be extortionate or unreasonable.

That resolution was sent to the House and was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. It was reported favorably by that committee, and is now before the House by virtue of the rule under which the previous question has already been adopted. So far as the merits of the proposition are concerned, they were debated at some considerable length yesterday, and they have been debated at some length again to-day. The committee was of opinion, therefore, that the time allowed under the rules of the House for the adoption of this rule—twenty minutes on each side—was sufficient debate to be allowed.

I confess, Mr. Speaker, I find it difficult to make any argument in favor of this proposition which is in any degree stronger than the language of the proposition itself. The proposition is that the American people engaged in a great enterprise shall buy their supplies in the American market from their own people in free competition whenever the prices for those supplies are not unreasonable or extortionate. Why we should not do so I am at a loss to know. If the carrying on of this great enterprise that is to involve so many millions of dollars and consume so long a time is to open a great market, that market ought to belong, naturally does belong, to the American people. If by reason of our system supplies of any kind are somewhat higher in our market than they are abroad, they are higher because of the higher wage rate in the American market, and it seems to me that it would be suicidal legislation that would undertake to take away from the American wage-earner the right, the privilege that he already enjoys under our system. I submit, therefore, that this proposition is an American proposition, and ought to be sustained by every loyal American citizen. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes, or such part of that as he may desire, to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] thinks that a very liberal amount of discussion has already taken place upon this most important subject. Incidentally a few Members yesterday and incidentally a few Members to-day for a short time, in the aggregate I think not equalling sixty minutes, talked about this general subject. How many millions or tens of millions, perhaps even a hundred millions of dollars are involved in it no man knows and no man can say.

Everybody ought to appreciate the fact that in engaging to construct this Panama Canal we have a great undertaking upon our hands. Nobody knows how long the work will last, nobody knows how much it will cost. All must know that there will be a considerable consumption of time running into years and years, and all can know that there will be hundreds of millions of dollars expended. Every dollar will come out of American citizenship, "American labor," even to use the term employed so affectionately by the gentleman here, so far as lip service is concerned, and treated with such contempt, so far as action goes.

It would seem, in a general way, that in providing for this work we ought to endeavor to arrange to do it as cheaply as in decency we can do it. That seems to be no more and no less than is due to the American taxpayer, the American citizen, the American laborer. The burden will be heavy enough at best. It threatens to become excessively heavy unless good management, good judgment, economy, and honesty are exercised throughout. It is even possible, great as this nation is and mighty as are its resources, that at no distant day, and long before this great work is completed, the American people may consider seriously the question of whether they had not better delay a while, in view of enormous expenditures, and let the completion of the work await a time when we shall be even more powerful, and when the contribution can be made with less tax upon the energy and the substance of the American people. I hope no such time ever will come. I hope there may be no halt in the work and that the burden may not become at any time too grievous to be borne by this mighty people.

But no one has any assurance that it may not be so. And no one who has regard for the interests that we have at stake at home or in Panama, no one who desires honestly and earnestly the speedy completion of the great canal, or who has any respect for the rights of the American people can approach this question, it seems to me, without a sense of gravity on account of its vast importance. Then why is it that this resolution is to be hurried through the House, under whip and spur, without consideration, with a contemptuous disregard for the duty of consideration, with an absolute and complete denial of all opportunity for considerations? What is it that this proposition involves? As things are now, the American President and the American Secretary of War and the American Canal Commission—every one of them—like all the other people of this land, of every party, are disposed to buy of American manufacturers and from American bidders, as you would do, Mr. Speaker, and I would do, and as every man here would do, and all of our constituents would do, following the common, everyday experience, when the purchase can be made upon as good terms here as can be obtained elsewhere. You and I prefer to buy from the home merchants, but we expect them to give us practically as good terms as they give in the more distant trade centers.

As things are now, everything will be bought from the American manufacturer unless it ought not to be bought from him; unless the Commission, disposed to buy from him, out of a sense of duty to the people of the United States, and zealous for the successful completion of this great undertaking, deliberately decide against their own inclination, that it ought not to be done. There is no need of protection in this direction. There is no need of an admonition to buy from Americans. Everything will be bought of American manufacturers without legislation that ought to be bought of them at all, as ninety-nine per cent of all canal supplies have thus far been bought from them.

What, then, is the object of this resolution to hamper the President, the Secretary of War, the Canal Commission—everybody who has anything to do with this matter—by virtue of which they will be under a degree of compulsion to buy from the American manufacturer at the American manufacturer's prices, with very little regard to what prices are elsewhere or what necessary supplies might be bought for elsewhere? Look how it will work, practically. Often it is necessary to make a purchase perhaps in an emergency; to make it quickly. There is an absolute compulsion, if this resolution be passed, to buy from the American manufacturer at the American home price, no matter how extortionate or how unreasonable it may be, unless the whole matter can be delayed and the President consulted, the whole facts laid before him, and the President shall direct a different course.

Now, how unbusinesslike that is, how unfair it is, how badly it certainly will work in practical operation and enforcement. Buy at the American price, however unreasonable, however extortionate, unless the matter be deemed of sufficient consequence and importance, and there be sufficient time without too great incidental loss in the delay involved to lay it before the President, make the President acquainted with the details, and have him pass upon it! No escape from extortion, from outrage, from robbery, provided that extortion, that outrage, and that robbery be projected and attempted by the American manufacturer, except through an appeal to the President in every particular instance! Ingenuity could not devise anything more thoroughly calculated to build up and foster trusts, or better calculated to beat down and injure labor and all the taxpaying people. And yet gentlemen talk about American wages and American labor and buying American supplies to complete this great American work! In the name of labor, I protest against such a perversion, such an outrage upon American labor!

Here, for instance, in the letter of the Secretary of War, is submitted a proposition whether two Scotch dredges shall be bought at a saving of over $70,000, or whether two American dredges shall be bought at a loss of over $70,000. Gentlemen who favor buying the two American dredges say, in effect: "Throw away $70,000 of the people's money, because American labor, forsooth, gets the advantage of it." Not a solitary penny of it goes to American labor; there is not the slightest increase in the wages of American labor; there is not a solitary advantage to American labor. The advantage is to the American monopolist alone, alone.

Now, all that we ask—and that is the law to-day—is that they may hold up against the greed and extortion of the American manufacturer the possibility and honest intention of buying things elsewhere at decent prices, if necessary. All that need be asked is that the American sell to the United States as cheap as he would sell to Colombia or Panama or Great Britain or all or any of the powers of darkness, if you please, if engaged in the construction of this Panama Canal. That is denied in the resolution of the Senate, which this rule is to drive through the House in flippant haste. American labor ought to rise and scorn, I will not say such hypocrisy, but this abuse of its rights and this presumption upon its assumed ignorance. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, how does the time stand?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has seventeen minutes remaining and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] ten minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield so much of that seventeen minutes as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. PAYNE. Under the present law the engineering department of the War Department, in its invitation for bids, puts in these general instructions to bidders:

> Second. Preference shall be given to articles or materials of domestic production, conditions of quality and price being equal, and including in the price of foreign articles the duty thereon.

Ever since the tariff law of 1897, as expressed in that law, articles imported into the United States and used by the Government pay the same duty as articles imported into the United States and used by individuals. In other words, bidders in foreign countries bidding against our own people have to take into consideration and pay the tariff duty on those articles in order to get them into the United States. And this is exactly right, because we want to provide, so far as we can, for the labor of our own people by suitable legislation. We want to encourage manufacture in the United States. We want to benefit and not destroy, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] says, the laboring people of the United States. It is the American idea—the protective idea—and sometimes called the "robber tariff" idea by gentlemen who either are careless as to the use of language or do not understand the workings and the benefit of the tariff law. But a protective tariff is the idea of the American people and the policy adopted by the American people.

Now, when we come to purchase supplies to be used in the Canal Zone, by the treaty with Panama we take all articles from abroad into that Zone free of duty, so that when any American wishes to bid on supplies to go into that Zone, he is brought into the open market without any tariff either way, and into competition with the nations of the earth. We who believe in the American idea can not hesitate to pass such a joint resolution as this, because we are spending American money building, as was said the other day, for the benefit of the world, this great canal, and it is fitting that all supplies to be used there should be bought in the United States, if they can be bought at a reasonable price compared with that of foreign countries. This resolution does not say that all articles must be bought in the United States or shall be of American manufacture, but that we should go into open competition in the market, and if the price is not extortionate or unreasonable compared with the other bids, we shall buy in the United States. It prevents any "hold up" on the part of the American manufacturers, if such a thing is possible. It preserves competition. It gives us a reasonable price and gives an American market for American goods.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] is disturbed because the construction of this canal involves the expenditure of millions of dollars. Well, those millions have been largely expended now for the purpose of buying tools and materials and building the railroad which it was necessary to build. The bulk of the expenditures for this purpose have already been made, and under open bids, and a very small fraction of the articles bought has been bought abroad. They have been bought in the United States. But under the law as it is to-day it is the duty of the President to take into consideration the difference in price and buy the goods where he can buy them the cheapest, without regard to the benefit accruing to American labor or protection to American labor. This resolution gives him a discretion when the prices are reasonable or are not extortionate. It gives the benefit to the American laborer and to the American people, and that is all there is in this resolution. It ought to be passed. The policy ought to be determined by Congress. The President has invited, by his communication to Congress, the determination of this question for his future guidance. Therefore I hope to see the resolution pass, and pass promptly. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he intends to conclude in one speech?

Mr. DALZELL. I think I have used as much time as the other side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has eleven minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi ten minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My question was whether the gentleman intended to conclude in one speech. I admit his right to conclude in one speech, but not in two speeches.

Mr. DALZELL. There will only be one speech on this side.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, it is seldom that the Republican party even has done a bolder or a hastier thing than this. A moment or two ago we were called out of the room, those of us who are members of the Committee on Rules, in hot haste, during a roll call, in order that this outrage on succeeding generations might be perpetrated by this House while it was in the mood to perpetrate it. I say upon succeeding generations, because succeeding generations must pay for this canal as well as ourselves. This is but another illustration of the fact that when tariff barons become tariff beggars for some favoritism, everything else must give way. I want the House at least to consider what it is invited to do. This is the resolution that you are invited to adopt without discussion and without amendment; without discussion substantially and actually without any amendment:

That purchases for the construction of the Panama Canal shall be restricted to articles of domestic production and manufacture from the lowest responsible bidder unless the President shall in any case deem the bids or tenders therefor to be—

Higher than other bids or tenders? No. As high as the same people charge foreigners? No—to be extortionate or unreasonable.

Extortionate quo ad what; unreasonable quo ad what?

How is the President going to determine whether they be "extortionate" or "unreasonable," except by comparison with other bids; and he is forbidden to take bids from anybody else except from the domestic producer. "The lowest responsible bidder" and all other bidders are "bidders of domestic production and manufacture." Then it follows that it is to be "extortionate or unreasonable," in view of other prices charged by our manufacturers to our own people in the home market. "Extortionate" in comparison with them; when they are already extortionate for all of us, as we all know.

Why do gentlemen desire to change the existing law? Why is this legislation here except for the purpose of changing the existing law? Who will furnish supplies down there as "domestic producers?" The United States Steel Association; the great cement trust, and all the balance of these great combinations, every one of them having two distinct prices, of which one is for the domestic consumer, including their own Government, and another for the foreign consumer, including foreign governments. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We can not, under this rule, amend this resolution. If we could amend it, I had desired first to offer the following amendment. Were it in order now I would offer this amendment to report as a substitute for S. R. 60, the resolution which I just read, the following:

That purchases for material for the use of the Panama canal shall continue to be made as they are now made under existing law and regulations of the Canal Commission.

Now, what is present law and practice? Why, the practice has been to buy from American manufacturers and producers, but to make them sell at their export prices. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is the existing law; that is the existing practice; and the Government and Commission should go on doing what they have been doing. Now, if this Senate resolution be adopted, prices in order to be declined are to be "extortionate," are to be "unreasonable" in comparison with what? Other bidders. Prices charged by these manufacturers to the home consumers in the American market.

Then I would have liked to offer this amendment:

Unless the President shall deem bids and tenders therefor—

That is the language of the resolution, which concludes:

to be extortionate or unreasonable.

I want to strike out the words "extortionate or unreasonable" and substitute these words:

To be the lowest bid made for the same goods to be delivered at the same point of delivery at the same time.

Then I wanted, if that had been voted down, to offer this: To strike out the language and insert, so as to read:

Unless the President shall deem these bids and tenders to be higher than the contemporaneous export prices of the manufacturer or producer bidding to sell goods to the Panama Commission or to the Panama Railway.

I suppose that I would not be violating any confidence to say that these three amendments were actually offered in the Committee on Rules, and there voted down by the Republican members.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us think about what we are doing. What is the existing law? "To build this great work as cheaply" as the Commission can. Aye, you all say build it as cheaply as you can, with one exception—that it must not result in any loss of profit to the great trusts and combinations—your campaign-fund providers. If I offer an amendment cheapening the process of construction in any other respect, I could get some willing ears on that side of the Chamber, but when I offer any proposition that involves, as this does, a diminution of the present extortionate profits of the American manufacturers, proven to be extortionate by the fact that they charge other and lower profits in foreign markets, then the whole Republican party, as organized in this House, but not, I hope, as it is organized in this country, cries "No; no. You must not touch the men who contribute our campaign funds." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You never did a bolder thing; you never did a hastier thing, and you never did a thing in all your lives for which swifter and greater retribution is to come than for this very thing you are doing to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Talk about American labor! Who is there with a particle of common sense upon this floor, on either side of this Chamber, who believes that if this Commission continues to buy these materials, supplies, and equipments in exactly the way they are buying them now, one dollar less will upon that account be paid to one single American laborer, from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico? Is there one of you with little enough brains to believe that? Is there one of you with so little brains that you believe that a single American laborer will be paid one cent per month, per week, or per day more after the passage of this resolution than before its passage? It is "the great American trust," not the great American laborer. It is the great American campaign contributor, not the great American wage-earner, that you are trying to take care of, and you know it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Labor! What have you done for American labor on the Isthmus itself? Why, it is alien labor that is building the canal, and, by your own laws, building it under alien hours of labor. The gentleman calls the canal a "great American work." You are about to make it a great plaything for the enrichment of great plutocrats and trust magnates and unjust and unpatriotic extortioners. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DALZELL. I yield the remainder of the time on this side to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the great question addressed to American statesmanship to-day in this country is the question of markets for the surplus products of American labor. There has been no act of political acumen that the genius of the Democratic party to do evil could devise during the last twenty-five years that it has not devised and carried into execution to strangle and destroy and impoverish American labor. [Applause on the Republican side.] And the evidence that it was evil is in the fact that labor always suffers when the Democratic party is in power. There has been no effort spared by the Republican party in the last twenty-five years that genius and patriotism and Americanism and Republicanism could devise to enhance the value of American labor that has not been done by that party, and the genius has been manifested in the success of its efforts. [Applause on the Republican side.] So much for that. Trusts may have grown up——

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; not now. This is not that kind of a debate.

Mr. RUCKER. It is on the very matter you just referred to, relating to the wages of American labor.

I only wanted to suggest that under the policies of your party manufacturers paid wage-earners in 1900 nearly $37,000,000 less than the same number of laborers would have received in 1890 under the wage rate then in force.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am neither able to hear what the gentleman says, nor——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio declines to yield.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi misinterprets the resolution pending before the House. He stated, as I understood him—and I am quite sure I did understand him, for he spoke very plainly—that while the President was authorized to demand that the proposals for the sales to the Commission should not be extortionate or unjust, yet he was deprived of the opportunity to test competition in the markets of the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the markets of the world.

Mr. GROSVENOR. In the markets of the world, I mean. Now, the provision of the resolution is exactly the reverse of the gentleman's proposition. Here is the language of the resolution:

> The purchases of material and equipment for use in the construction of the Panama Canal shall be restricted to articles of domestic production and manufacture, from the lowest responsible bidder, unless the President shall, in any case, deem the bids or tenders therefor to be extortionate or unreasonable.

So that when the Commission seeks to enter the markets of the world or the markets of the United States for tenders of supplies of any character, bids from all the world may be received under this proposition, and the test of whether any bid is extortionate or unreasonable will be furnished by the tenders and bids themselves. So that the whole proposition of the gentleman, which he built up on the structure I have indicated, falls absolutely to the ground. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, it is the purpose of the Republican party to do all that in its power lies to furnish to the labor and industry of this country a market for its production. That is the purpose of this legislation. It is the opinion of the Congress of the United States, not in a peremptory and controlling sense, but in a proposition that is suggestive and persuasive to the authorities that are buying these materials, that they ought to be bought from the American producer.

Why, Mr. Speaker, in every little town, in every county, in every city of the United States the popular demand goes up always to every purchasing board of trustees, to every municipal corporation or any other corporation engaged in building, and to the private consumer of the commodities that we all require—the appeal goes up from popular demand that the domestic producer, the man who produces nearest the consumer, shall have the opportunity to compete upon fair terms, and if he does succeed he shall have the market for the production. [Applause.] That is the true American policy, and that is the policy of this resolution. It has been discussed here for a day or two, more or less, and we all understand it. It binds this Government to the expenditure of not one extortionate dollar. It compels this Government to no contract that it can get a better proposition for from some place else, if the home demand be not unreasonable.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Is the gentleman in favor of buying Scotch dredges at $654,000 or American dredges at $724,850?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have had some knowledge of dredge-buying business.

Mr. DE ARMOND. That is the reason that I thought the gentleman could answer.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I can answer, and I am in favor of offering the Scotchman in the Clyde and the American in New York the proposition to build the dredges on plans required, whatever they may be; and I will say that from my information, drawn from the testimony before the committee, that the American dredge maker will get the contract on terms equally favorable to the American people. There is nothing in the gentleman's proposition if he will investigate it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. But which one would the gentleman buy?

Mr. GROSVENOR. If I believed that the American dredge maker offered his production at a fair price, and it was to be strictly of American labor out of American material, I would buy the American dredge. [Applause on the Republican side.] The difficulty about the position of the gentleman from Missouri is this: He takes the ground that the Government ought to be careful and look out and skin down to the lowest possible the production. Our proposition is that we should consider all the time the benefits to flow to the American mechanic, the American laborer, and the American producer of material. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DE ARMOND. I have another question which I would like to ask the gentleman, and that is whether this really is not designed to bring in that condition of things when there will be a compulsion to buy just as the gentleman says he would buy the dredge costing $724,850, instead of $654,000.

Mr. GROSVENOR. When there is such compulsion, the American Congress has intelligence enough to repeal that resolution. I do not believe that such a condition will ever happen. Now let me go on, for I have but little time left. The gentleman from Mississippi threatens the Republican side of this House with retribution. Well, I have read somewhere that vengeance was not located in the possession of the gentleman from Mississippi. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Nor is retribution. But we have heard this before. I heard it twenty years ago, and I have heard it on each recurring biennial election as we were approaching the period of nominations and elections. From that side of the House I have heard that same old song. It used to give me some alarm; it used to give me some sleepless hours.

"Retribution! The people are going to rise and sweep the Republicans away. The people are going to take vengeance and retribution upon the Republican side." Well, they did deal out a little retribution on us in the Fifty-third Congress, but six more Congresses have rolled around and retribution seems to have been suspended all that time. [Laughter on the Republican side.] And with that prophetic declaration, that prophetic utterance on that side of the House, the terrible forebodings upon that side of the House have never ceased and are dragged out now in the same old tune and the same old strain. They are not coming so much from the people. There was not any retribution on the Republican party the other day when two Representatives of Congress from the State of Oregon were elected by 15,000 majority [applause on the Republican side] in a State that has since I have been a Member of Congress elected one or more Democrats to sit on the floor of Congress. I do not see any signs of retribution, and now at a time when we are exporting more goods to foreign markets, when we are paying higher wages to laborers producing them, it is not the time for us to be frightened at the prophecy of the owl or the croaking of the raven of despair. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TOWNSEND). The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was being taken,

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 138, nays 83, answered "present" 11, not voting 148, as follows:

For the balance of the day:

Mr. TAWNEY with Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama.

Mr. ESCH with Mr. TRIMBLE.

Mr. AMES with Mr. RUCKER.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL COLLECTION DISTRICT IN THE STATE OF TEXAS.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 10715.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10715) to establish an additional collection district in the State of Texas, and for other purposes.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The statement was read.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10715) to establish an additional collection district in the State of Texas, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, and 5, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add at the end of section 1 the following: "And the charges for the use of said docks and wharves shall be just and reasonable and shall not be greater than charges for similar services at other ports of the United States on the Gulf of Mexico;" and the Senate agree to the same.

CHARLES CURTIS,
H. S. BOUTELL,
CHAMP CLARK,
Managers on the part of the House.

S. B. ELKINS,
A. J. HOPKINS,
A. S. CLAY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House on the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10715) to establish an additional collection district in the State of Texas, and for other purposes, submit the following statement:

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 5, and recedes from its disagreement to amendment No. 4 with an amendment.

Amendment No. 1 applies to slip No. 3 in Taylors Bayou, which was shown to your committee to be private property, and therefore was not under the control of the Port Arthur Canal and Dock Company.

Amendments Nos. 2 and 3 are in reference to the State of Texas ceding to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the waterway, basins, and slips. As the legislature of Texas does not meet for some time, your committee thought it advisable to agree to the amendments striking out these requirements, because there is no doubt when the legislature does meet such cession will be made by the State of Texas, and to retain the provisions in the bill would unnecessarily delay the putting in operation of the provisions of the bill.

Amendment No. 5 makes Sabine, in the State of Texas, a subport of entry and delivery, with full authority and license to enroll, enter, and clear vessels, receive entries, collect dues, fees, and other moneys, and generally to perform the functions prescribed by the laws for collectors of customs, and perform such other services as in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury the exigencies of commerce may require. Your managers agreed to this amendment because they believed it was doing only what was fair and just to Sabine.

Amendment No. 4, as agreed to by the committee of conference, provides that the charges for the use of the docks and wharves shall be just and reasonable, and shall not be greater than the charges for similar services at other ports on the Gulf of Mexico.

Your managers recommend the adoption of the report.

CHAS. CURTIS,
H. S. BOUTELL,
CHAMP CLARK,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri rose.

Mr. CURTIS. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Only a minute. I simply want to make one statement, because I promised Senator BAILEY to make it, and that is that neither he nor I believed that it was necessary to put in the part there about the charges for docking, because we believe Congress had that jurisdiction anyway. He was not willing for the report to be agreed to unless I would make that statement on the floor of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BLACKFEET RESERVATION.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up conference report on the bill H. R. 19681.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19681) to survey and allot lands embraced within the limits of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and to open surplus lands for settlement.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19681) to survey and allot the lands embraced within the limits of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation in the State of Montana, and to open the surplus lands to settlement, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the Senate amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to immediately cause to be surveyed all of the lands embraced within the limits of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana.

"SEC. 2. That so soon as all the lands embraced within the Blackfeet Indian Reservation shall have been surveyed the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall cause allotments of the same to be made under the provisions of the allotment laws of the United States to all persons having tribal rights or holding tribal relations and may rightfully belong on said reservation. That there shall be allotted to each member forty acres of irrigable land and two hundred and forty acres of additional land valuable only for grazing purposes, or at the option of the allottee the entire two hundred and eighty acres may be taken in land valuable only for grazing purposes, and for the irrigable lands allotted there is hereby reserved out of the waters of the reservation sufficient to irrigate said irrigable lands, and the United States shall and does hold said reserved waters in trust as appurtenant to the lands so allotted for the trust period named in the patent to be issued: Provided, That such reservation and trust shall only apply to such waters as may be actually and necessarily appropriated for the irrigable portions of Indian allotments within two years from the date of the issuance of the proclamation by the President opening the unallotted lands to settlement; and, pending such actual appropriation of water by and for any Indian allottee, all of said water shall be subject to use under the laws of Montana, but such use shall not be held to create a right adverse to any Indian allottee who actually appropriates water or for whom an actual appropriation of water is made to the extent that may be necessary for use on the allotment within the time limit aforesaid, but on the contrary each Indian allottee shall have and enjoy the prior right to appropriate water actually necessary for the irrigation of his or her allotment at any time within two years after the issue of the President's proclamation aforesaid: And provided further, That, subject to the foregoing provisions, all water rights and privileges on or connected with streams within or adjoining said reservation shall be subject to the laws of the State of Montana: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may reserve such lands as he may deem necessary for agency, school, and religious purposes, to remain reserved so long as needed and so long as agency, school, or religious institutions are maintained thereon for the benefit of the Indians, not exceeding two hundred and eighty acres to any one religious society; also such tract or tracts of timber lands as he may deem expedient for the use and benefit of the Indians of said reservation in common; but such reserved lands, or any part thereof, may be disposed of from time to time in such manner as the said Secretary may determine: Provided, That there is hereby granted two hundred and eighty acres each to the Holy Family Mission on Two Medicine Creek and the Mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church near Browning, to be selected by the authorities of said missions, respectively, embracing the mission buildings and improvements thereon.

"SEC. 3. That upon the completion of said allotments the President of the United States shall appoint a commission consisting of three persons to inspect, appraise, and value all of the said lands that shall not have been allotted in severalty to said Indians or reserved by the Secretary of the Interior or otherwise disposed of; said commission to be constituted as follows: One commissioner shall be a person holding tribal relations with said Indians, one a resident citizen of the State of Montana, and one a United States special Indian agent or Indian inspector of the Interior Department.

"That within thirty days after their appointment said commissioners shall meet at some point within the Blackfeet Indian Reservation and organize by the election of one of their number as chairman. Said commission is hereby empowered to select a clerk at a salary of not to exceed five dollars per day.

"That said commissioners shall then proceed to personally inspect and classify and appraise, by the smallest legal subdivisions of forty acres each, all of the remaining lands embraced within said reservation. In making such classification and appraisement said lands shall be divided into the following classes: First, agricultural land of the first class; second, agricultural land of the second class; third, grazing land; fourth, timber land; fifth, mineral land, the mineral land not to be appraised.

"That said commissioners shall be paid a salary of not to exceed ten dollars per day each while actually employed in the inspection and classification of said lands; such inspection and classification to be completed within nine months from the date of the organization of said commission.

"SEC. 4. That when said commission shall have completed the classification and appraisement of all of said lands and the same shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, the land shall be disposed of under the general provisions of the homestead, mineral and town-site laws of the United States, except such of said lands as shall have been classified as timber lands, and except such sections sixteen and thirty-six of each township, or any part thereof, for which the State of Montana has not heretofore received indemnity lands under existing laws, which sections, or parts thereof, are hereby granted to the State of Montana for school purposes. And in case either of said sections or parts thereof is lost to the State of Montana by reason of allotment thereof to any Indian or Indians, or otherwise, the governor of said State, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, is hereby authorized to select other lands not occupied or reserved within said reservation, not exceeding two sections in any one township, which selections shall be made prior to the opening of the lands to settlement: Provided, That the United States shall pay to the said Indians for the lands in said section sixteen and thirty-six, so granted, or the lands within said reservation selected in lieu thereof, the sum of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre.

"SEC. 5. That the lands so classified and appraised shall be opened to settlement and entry by proclamation of the President, which proclamation shall prescribe the time when and the manner in which these lands may be settled upon, occupied, and entered by persons entitled to make entry thereof, and no person shall be permitted to settle upon, occupy, or enter any of said lands, except as prescribed in such proclamation, until after the expiration of sixty days from the time when the same are opened to settlement and entry: Provided, That the rights of honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors of the late civil and the Spanish wars and the Philippine insurrection, as defined and described in sections twenty-three hundred and four and twenty-three hundred and five of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March first, nineteen hundred and one, shall not be abridged, but no entry shall be allowed under section twenty-three hundred and six of the Revised Statutes: Provided further, That the price of said lands shall be the appraised value thereof, as fixed by said commission, which in no case shall be less than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre for agricultural and grazing lands and five dollars per acre for timber lands; but settlers under the homestead law who shall reside upon and cultivate the land entered in good faith for the period required by existing law shall pay one-fifth of the appraised value in cash at the time of entry and the remainder in five equal annual installments, to be paid in one, two, three, four, and five years, respectively, from and after the date of entry, and when the entryman shall have complied with all the requirements and terms of the homestead laws as to settlement and residence, and shall have made all the required payments aforesaid, he shall be entitled to a patent for the lands entered: Provided, That he shall make his final proofs in accordance with the homestead laws within seven years from date of entry, and that aliens who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States may become such entrymen, but before making final proof and receiving patent they must receive their full naturalization papers: And provided further, That the fees and commissions at the time of commutation or final entry shall be the same as are now provided by law where the price of land is one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre: Provided, That if any entryman fails to make such payments, or any of them, within the time stated, or to make final proof within seven years from date of entry, all rights in and to the land covered by his entry shall at once cease, and any payments theretofore made shall be forfeited and the entry shall be forfeited and canceled: Provided, That nothing in this act shall prevent homestead settlers from commuting their entries under section twenty-three hundred and one, Revised Statutes, by paying for the land entered the price fixed by said commission, receiving credit for payments previously made.

"SEC. 6. That if, after the approval of the classification and appraisement, as provided herein, there shall be found lands within the limits of the reservation under irrigation projects deemed practicable under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June seventeenth, nineteen hundred and two, known as the reclamation act, said lands shall be subject to withdrawal and be disposed of under the provisions of said act, and settlers shall pay, in addition to the cost of construction and maintenance provided therein, the appraised value, as provided in this act, to the proper officers, to be covered into the Treasury of the United States for the credit of the Indians: Provided, That all lands hereby opened to settlement remaining undisposed of at the end of five years from the taking effect of this act shall be sold to the highest bidder for cash, at not less than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior; and any lands remaining unsold ten years after said lands shall have been opened to entry shall be sold to the highest bidder, for cash, without regard to the minimum limit above stated: Provided, That not more than six hundred and forty acres of land shall be sold to any one person or company.

"SEC. 7. That the lands within said reservation not already previously entered, whether classified as agricultural, grazing, timber, or mineral lands, shall be subject to exploration, location, and purchase under the general provisions of the United States mineral and coal land laws, at the prices therein fixed, except that no mineral or coal exploration, location, or purchase shall be permitted upon any lands allotted to an Indian.

"SEC. 8. That lands classified and returned by said commission as timber lands shall be sold and disposed of by the Secretary of the Interior, under sealed bids to the highest bidder for cash at not less than five dollars per acre, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe: Provided, That the said timber lands shall be sold in tracts not exceeding forty acres, with preference right of purchase to actual settlers, including Indian allottees residing in the vicinity, at the highest price bid.

"SEC. 9. That after deducting the expenses of the commission of classification, appraisement, and sale of lands, and such other incidental expenses as shall have been necessarily incurred, including the cost of survey of said lands, the balance realized from the proceeds of the sale of the lands in conformity with this act shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and placed to the credit of said Indian tribe. Not exceeding one-third of the total amount thus deposited in the Treasury, together with one-third of the amount of the principal of all other funds now placed to the credit of or which is due said tribe of Indians from all sources, shall be expended from time to time by the Secretary of the Interior, as he may deem advisable for the benefit of said Indians, in the construction and maintenance of irrigation ditches, the purchase of stock cattle, horses, and farming implements, and in their education and civilization. The remainder of all funds deposited in the Treasury, realized from such sale of lands herein authorized, together with the remainder of all other funds now placed to the credit of or that shall hereafter become due to said tribe of Indians, shall, upon the date of the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of the allotments of land authorized by this act, be allotted in severalty to the members of the tribe, the persons entitled to share as members in such distribution to be determined by said Secretary; the funds thus allotted and apportioned shall be placed to the credit of such individuals upon the books of the United States Treasury for the benefit of such allottees, their legatees, or heirs. The President may, by Executive order, from time to time order the distribution and payment of such funds or the interest accruing therefrom to such individual members of the tribe as, in his judgment, would be for the best interests of such individuals to have such distribution made, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe therefor: Provided, That so long as the United States shall hold the funds as trustee for any member of the tribe the Indian beneficiary shall be paid interest thereon annually at the rate of four per cent per annum.

"SEC. 10. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of sixty-five thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay for the lands granted to the State of Montana and for lands reserved for agency and school purposes, at the rate of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre; also the sum of seventy-five thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to survey, classify, and appraise the lands of said reservation as provided herein, and also to defray the expense of the appraisement and survey of said town sites, the latter sums to be reimbursable out of the funds arising from the sale of said lands.

"SEC. 11. That nothing in this act contained shall in any manner bind the United States to purchase any part of the land herein described, except sections sixteen and thirty-six, or the equivalent, in each township that may be granted to the State of Montana, the reserved tracts hereinbefore mentioned for agency and school purposes, or to dispose of said land except as provided herein, or to guarantee to find purchasers for said lands or any part thereof, it being the intention of this act that the United States shall act as trustee for said Indians to dispose of said lands and to expend and pay over the proceeds received from the sale thereof only as received.

"SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to reserve and set aside for town-site purposes, and to survey, lay out, and plat into town lots, streets, alleys, and parks, not less than eighty acres of said land at or near the present settlements of Browning and Babb, and each of such other places as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary or convenient for town sites, in such manner as will best subserve the present needs and the reasonable prospective growth of said settlements. Such town sites shall be surveyed, appraised, and disposed of as provided in section twenty-three hundred and eighty-one of the United States Revised Statutes: Provided, That any person who, at the date when the appraisers commence their work upon the land, shall be an actual resident upon any one such lot and the owner of substantial and permanent improvements thereon, and who shall maintain his or her residence and improvements on such lot to the date of his or her application to enter, shall be entitled to enter at any time prior to the day fixed for the public sale, and at the appraised value thereof, such lot and any one additional lot of which he or she may also be in possession and upon which he or she may have substantial and permanent improvements: Provided further, That before making entry of any such lot or lots, the applicant shall make proof to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of the land district in which the land lies of such residence, possession, and ownership of improvements, under such regulations as to time, notice, manner, and character of proof as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That in making their appraisal of the lots so surveyed it shall be the duty of the appraisers to ascertain the names of the residents upon and occupants of any such lots, the character and extent of the improvements thereon, and the name of the reputed owner thereof, and to report their findings in connection with their report of appraisal, which report of findings shall be taken as prima facie evidence of the facts therein set out. All such lots not so entered prior to the day fixed for the public sale shall be offered at public outcry in their regular order with the other unimproved and unoccupied lots: Provided, however, That no lot shall be sold for less than ten dollars: And provided further, That said lots when surveyed shall approximate fifty by one hundred and fifty feet in size."

And the Senate agree to the same.

J. S. SHERMAN,
CHAS. CURTIS,
WM. T. ZENOR,
Managers on the part of the House.

W. A. CLARK,
FRED T. DUBOIS,
MOSES E. CLAPP,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement was read, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The Senate in passing the House bill struck out all after the enacting clause and inserted Senate bill No. 6354. As agreed to in conference all after the enacting clause as passed by the Senate is again stricken out and the House bill is substituted therefor, modified so that instead of each head of a family receiving 80 acres of irrigable land and 240 acres of grazing land, each member of the tribe is given 40 acres of irrigable land and 280 acres of grazing land.

The conference report also modifies this bill so as to provide that waters for the use of the Indians shall be reserved for two years following the proclamation of the President opening the unallotted lands to settlement instead of five years from the date of the approval of the allotment by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Under the terms of the bill the proclamation of the President can not be issued until after the conclusion of allotments.

The conference report also modifies the bill so as to permit the use of the waters, without prejudice to the Indians, pending the date of allotments and appropriation of the water by the Indian allottees.

A further amendment grants 280 acres each to two religious societies now having institutions upon said reservation.

It also strikes out the provision that lands taken by the Reclamation Service must be paid for out of the reclamation fund within one year from the date of withdrawal, and provides in lieu of this provision that the lands when sold shall be paid for to the proper officers and the money covered into the Treasury to the credit of the Indians.

An amendment also adds to the lands which shall be subject to exploration, location, purchase, etc., mineral lands as well as grazing and timber lands, etc.

Another amendment provides that the clerk to be appointed by the commission created to appraise the lands shall be paid $5 per day instead of $7, as provided in the House bill as it passed.

J. S. SHERMAN,
CHARLES CURTIS,
WM. T. ZENOR,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CURTIS. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. LACEY. I notice you have reduced the time for the appropriation of water to two years. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that entirely too short a time to enable the Indians to avail themselves of water enough to irrigate their holdings?

Mr. CURTIS. The managers on the part of the House thought that, as the date of the appropriation of the water was changed to two years from the issuing of the proclamation, the time was sufficient. The House bill provided that the water should be appropriated within five years from the date of the allotment. The proclamation will not be issued until the Secretary of the Interior advises the President that the conditions on the reservation are proper for the proclamation to be issued; and therefore we thought that two years would be ample time.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman will recall the fact that five years was the lowest period that the House committee seemed to think would be proper, and some wanted to make it seven.

Mr. CURTIS. And some wanted to make it three years, if the gentleman from Iowa will remember. The managers thought that two years would be ample time.

Mr. LACEY. I want to say that I fear that in making that time so short the result will be that the Indians will find themselves without water.

Mr. CURTIS. We will have plenty of time to extend it by another act, in case this is found insufficient. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the adoption of the report.

The question was taken; and the report was agreed to.

HOUSE DOCUMENT.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print as House document two letters relating to pending legislation. They are both from officials of the United States.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand those letters are written by officers of the Government?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 5901. An act to extend the time for the completion of the Alaska Central Railway, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 1816. An act for the relief of the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana—to the Committee on War Claims.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the naval appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18750) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, receding from its disagreement to amendment No. 4, and insisting on its disagreement to the remaining amendments, and requesting a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate further insist on its amendments still in disagreement and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. TILLMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

GRADING AND INSPECTION OF GRAIN.

Mr. McCUMBER. I present a petition in the shape of a letter, which I ask may be read and printed in the RECORD. It is very short. After it is read I wish to make a very brief statement explaining it.

There being no objection, the Secretary read the letter, as follows:

SUPERIOR BOARD OF TRADE,
Superior Wis., June 12, 1906.

Hon. P. J. McCUMBER, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are directed by the board of directors of the Superior Board of Trade to write you regarding the overage of 26,000,000 bushels of grain as indicated by the figures taken by one Mr. Crumpton from the official figures of the Minnesota grain and warehouse commission. This report, as well as the official figures, are now claimed to be erroneous.

We do not vouch for the accuracy of any of their figures, nor do we contend that the purloining is to exceed possibly 6,000,000 bushels, but it is no doubt of sufficient quantity to cause alarm, and of sufficient importance to justify an investigation by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

We would strongly urge such an investigation, and if desired will take pleasure in extending to you the assistance of persons here who have been familiar with the grain operations for several years.

The friends of the present Minnesota inspection lay great stress upon some error claimed in arriving at the figures of this large overage, but this is only one of the vulnerable points.

They say nothing of their attempts to cover up this stealing by shipping out wheat as screenings, but an investigation will bring out these facts, as we can name men who know it to be true, and who will give dates, weights, numbers of cars, persons to whom sold, and prices paid.

They say nothing about the pressure brought to bear on Mr. Crumpton to get him to change his figures and to retract sworn testimony given by him in circuit court before Judge Parish.

Mr. Crumpton is now a member of the Duluth Board of Trade, having paid about $2,500 for his membership, and they, the Duluth board, might make this a serious matter for his business and membership.

If we can be of assistance to you in this campaign for honest grain inspection, give the word—we can and will help. Should you need copies of sworn affidavits in the case in the United States court, will get them for you. Wire if in a hurry.

Dakota people are assuring us of the great benefit your efforts and our efforts are yielding.

Let the good work continue.

Yours, very truly,
J. H. ROTH, President.
A. N. LENT, Secretary.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, in explanation of this letter, I simply desire to state that the letter was received by me last Friday. It comes from the president of the Superior Board of Trade and seems to come as the result of official action taken by that board. I immediately wired the writer to see if it was satisfactory to have it made a part of the RECORD, and received an affirmative answer.

Mr. President, in asking that this letter go in the RECORD in connection with the statement made by the Minnesota grain and warehouse commission, introduced by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] some few days ago, I do not wish to be understood as conceding that it is the important issue in the matter of grain grading and inspection. It is of minor importance as compared with the dissatisfaction which grows out of the system of weighing, grading, inspecting, and mixing.

The statement of this commission, which has been made a part of the RECORD, admits that the grades are raised in the elevators after cleaning. However, inasmuch as the grain is docked sufficiently to allow not only for the dirt, cockle, or other foul stuff, but also to cover the expense of the cleaning, the producer claims, and I agree with him, that he should have the benefit of the grade after it is cleaned.

The commission also admits the mixing of grades for export, and attempts to justify it. But where this mixing is allowed the inclination of the mixer is to get all he possibly can of the lower grade into the compound, and when it reaches the foreign port it is not the good No. 1 or No. 2 northern which the purchaser has agreed to receive. Our consular reports are filled with complaints of this character, and our wheat is being discredited by reason of it.

It seems, Mr. President, from the statement made and reported by the commission that Mr. Crumpton, on whose testimony Judge Sanborn found that there was overage in the elevators of about 26,000,000 in about ten years in favor of the purchasers, now makes a statement or affidavit that he made some errors in his computation or estimate—that is, that there are some matters which he did not take into consideration.

The letter from the Superior Board of Trade may throw some light on the credence which should be given to this latter statement. Letters which I received from Mr. Crumpton several years ago, after he had had an opportunity to examine practically the same figures as are reported, do not harmonize with his present statement.

A joint resolution requesting an investigation of this subject is now before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I am not a member of that committee and therefore unable to move it to action, but I sincerely hope that the committee will give it the attention that the gravity of the situation and its importance justify and will report the joint resolution in sufficient time to dispose of it at this session.

There seems to be a wide difference of opinion between the Minnesota board and the elevator companies on the one side and the Superior Board of Trade and Judge Sanborn's decision and the producers in my State on the other side. It involves a very important matter to our commerce; and the investigation ought to be made in justice to both sides and in justice to all claimants. Nothing but good can result from such an investigation. I hope that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will give all parties who are asking for the investigation that which they desire.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PERKINS presented a joint resolution of the legislature of California, praying for a suspension of the operations of section 2324, Revised Statutes, requiring the expenditure annually of $100 in labor and improvements upon unpatented mining claims; which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint resolution No. 3.

Whereas the recent conflagration which destroyed a large portion of the city and county of San Francisco has resulted in withdrawing a large amount of capital annually employed in the State of California in the prospecting for, working, and developing mines, has particularly worked a hardship upon those persons who annually contribute a large amount of money for the performance of the annual labor upon mining claims, as required by the provisions of section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States:

Resolved, therefore, by the senate of the State of California and assembly jointly, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress use all honorable means to secure the passage of legislation by the present Congress, suspending the operation for the year of 1906 of that portion of the Revised Statutes of the United States, section 2324 thereof, requiring the expenditure annually of $100 in labor and improvements upon unpatented mining claims, similar legislation having been enacted in the years 1893 and 1894: Be it therefore

Resolved, That the secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit a copy of this resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

A. B. NYE,
Private Secretary of the Governor.

Mr. PERKINS presented a memorial of the legislature of California, remonstrating against any reduction being made in the appropriation for the maintenance of the hydrographic branch of the Geological Survey; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint resolution No. 2.

Whereas the hydrographic branch of the Geological Survey has rendered conspicuous service to the people of the United States and especially of the State of California; and

Whereas any reduction in the amount of money appropriated for its maintenance would seriously cripple and reduce the efficiency of its works: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate and assembly jointly, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of California be, and they are hereby, urgently requested to use every honorable means to prevent any reduction in the sundry civil bill of the amount of the appropriation providing for the maintenance of the hydrographic branch of the Geological Survey. The secretary of senate is hereby directed to mail a copy of this resolution to the said Senators and Representatives.

ALDEN ANDERSON,
President of the Senate.
THOS. E. ATKINSON,

Senate joint resolution No. 2.

LEWIS A. HILBORN,
Secretary of the Senate.

Adopted in assembly June 11, A. D. 1906.

CLIO LLOYD,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

This resolution was received by the governor this 12th day of June, A. D. 1906.

A. B. NYE,
Private Secretary of the Governor.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of 150 employees of the United States Senate, praying that the names of Curtis Washington and John Coleman, barbers in the employees' barber shop of the Senate, be placed on the skilled laborers' roll; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BURKETT presented resolutions adopted by the Nebraska Stock Growers' Association, relative to the meat-inspection provision in the agricultural appropriation bill; which were referred to the Senate conferees on the agricultural appropriation bill, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We, the Nebraska Stock Growers' Association, in regular meeting assembled, recognizing the great injury and damage that has fallen upon the live-stock industry by reason of the investigation and reports of the conditions surrounding the packing-house products, and the sanitary condition of the packing houses of Chicago, and realizing that speedy action is necessary if further damage is to be averted, hereby urge our National Congress, and especially the Nebraska members thereof, to pass such legislation as will improve and strengthen Government inspection of all packing-house meat products, and that will prescribe and enforce such sanitary regulations for packing houses as will leave no room for criticism of their methods.

We, as cattle growers, recommend that the pending Beveridge bill be carefully considered and revised before being enacted into law. We, as stock growers, especially object to that provision of the bill which would levy the cost of animal and meat inspection upon the packers. Government inspection of food products is for the protection of the whole nation, and the cost should fall equally upon all who are benefited. The cost, as provided in the Beveridge bill, will eventually fall upon the live-stock growers and permits more tribute to be levied upon an industry already depressed: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Nebraska.

Mr. BURKETT presented a petition of the Nebraska Stock Growers' Association, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the disposal of such portions of the public lands in that State as is unsuited for agricultural purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. NELSON presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from Thuet Brothers, live stock commission merchants, of South St. Paul, Minn., praying for the enactment of a rigid meat-inspection law; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

SOUTH ST. PAUL, MINN., June 18, 1906.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The live stock dealers and producers desire a rigid meat-inspection law. The cost to be paid by the Government. Law should be passed promptly to stop this agitation.

THUET BROTHERS,
Live Stock Commission Merchants.

Mr. BLACKBURN presented sundry papers to accompany the bill (S. 5270) for the relief of Ellenor Gibson Whitney; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LONG. I present certain petitions in relation to the railroad rate bill. I ask that one of them be read and that the others be referred to the Senate conferees on the railroad rate bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the petition.

The Secretary read as follows:

INDEPENDENCE, KANS., June 11, 1906.

Hon. C. I. LONG,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

As a producer in the Kansas and Indian Territory fields and being vitally interested in the welfare and prosperity of those fields, I would request that the pipe-line amendment to the rate bill now before the joint conference committee be stricken out. If this is permitted to pass, it will work a great injury to the oil business in Kansas and Indian Territory and will act against the general welfare of the producer.

A. C. STICH.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petitions presented by the Senator from Kansas will be referred to the Senate conferees on the bill, as requested.

Mr. LONG presented memorials of A. C. Stich, John F. Overfield, George W. Finley, and H. W. Conrad, all of Independence; of C. E. Saddler, secretary of the Oil Producers' Association of Sedan; of P. H. Albright, president of the Union Oil Company, of Winfield; of H. C. Ewers & Co., of Sedan, all in the State of Kansas, and of William Johnston, of Bartlesville, Ind. T., remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" relative to pipe lines; which were referred to the Senate conferees on the railroad rate bill.

Mr. FORAKER. I have numerous similar telegrams, protesting against the provision of the railroad rate bill in regard to pipe lines. I send them to the desk and ask that they may be filed as petitions, and I would be glad if they could be referred to the conferees who now have that bill under consideration. I tried to get them there, but the august presence would not tolerate any petitions, and I did not succeed in leaving them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorials will be referred to the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. But not to the conference.

Mr. FORAKER. To the conferees was the request I made. I did not know what the parliamentary usage is in that respect; and I could not get beyond the doorkeeper. I suppose the conferees did not know of it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I merely want to comment upon the sarcastic allusion of the Senator from Ohio to the august presence of the conferees. As I am the only member of the conference committee on the part of the Senate whom I see present, I wish to take occasion to say that if we should add to our troubles (and we have enough of them since the bill has been sent back to conference), I think, probably, the present session of Congress might last considerably longer than we expect. We therefore have felt unwilling to take up the numerous telegrams that have been sent from the lumber interests and the pipe-line interests and others. When anyone has sent us telegrams we have received them, but we have not felt willing to have arguments made, because we have arguments enough among ourselves, I assure the Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. I understood that there was some trouble of that kind in the inner chamber. I was only speaking of my experience at the door. It was the doorkeeper who would not allow me to proceed.

Mr. TILLMAN. As I said, we could not afford—at least we did not feel willing—at this stage of the proceedings to add to our misery by having long arguments made in conference, after we had listened to them four days here in the Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand how it was that the conferees did not want this additional light. They have had trouble enough with what light they have.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorials presented by the Senator from Ohio will be referred to the Senate conferees on the bill, as requested.

Mr. FORAKER presented memorials of L. G. Neeley, president of the Neeley Clover Company, Ohio, general manager of the Ohio Valley Oil and Gas Company, Indiana, and secretary of the Nelson Oil Company, of Kansas; of D. W. Jay, of St. Paris; of E. C. Kurtz, of St. Marys; of W. L. Russell, of Lima; of D. C. Davis, of Marietta; of William M. Melville, of Lima; of J. O. Hover, of Lima; of J. R. Longsworth, of Lima; of M. M. Rose, of Marietta; of Walter B. Richie, of Lima; of W. B. Jack, manager of the National Oil Company, of Wapakoneta; of J. D. S. Neely, of Lima; of S. M. Murdock, of Lima; of W. W. Mills, of Marietta; of D. B. Torpy, of Marietta; of M. D. Shaw, of Wapakoneta; of J. B. Kerr, of Lima; of S. W. Van Cleve, of Lima; of E. J. Cable, of Lima; of Thomas Hanley, district superintendent of the Southern Oil Company, of Marietta; of R. B. Gordon, of St. Marys; George C. Best, of Marietta; of T. W. Moore, of Marietta; of A. Alderman, of Marietta; of J. E. Lowry, of Lima; of C. D. Palmer, manager of the Lorenz Oil Company, of Marietta, all in the State of Ohio; of C. C. Harris, J. L. Loney, and B. F. Tupper, of Independence, Kans., and of the Continent Oil Producers' Association, of Bartlesville, Ind. T., remonstrating against the adoption of a certain amendment to the so-called "railroad rate bill" relative to pipe lines; which were referred to the Senate conferees on the railroad rate bill.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BURNHAM, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 188) for the relief of the legal representatives of George W. Soule, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BURKETT. I am directed by the minority of the committee to submit views adverse to this claim.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska presents the views of the minority in connection with the bill. They will be printed, to accompany the report.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 19522) establishing regular terms of the United States circuit and district courts of the northern district of California at Eureka, Cal., reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 16th instant proposing to increase the appropriation for military posts from $750,000 to $973,750, intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 16th instant, proposing to appropriate $15,000 for completing the approaches, subdividing and finishing the attic story, and increasing the business facilities of the public building at Cheyenne, Wyo., intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon, and moved that it be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 6471) granting an increase of pension to Ella E. Kenney; and

A bill (H. R. 16875) granting an increase of pension to John K. Hart.

Mr. McCUMBER (for Mr. CARMACK), from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4967) granting an increase of pension to Joshua Holcomb, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also (for Mr. PATTERSON), from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 19245) granting an increase of pension to William C. Hoover; and

A bill (H. R. 14257) granting an increase of pension to Fleming H. Freeland.

Mr. McCUMBER (for Mr. BURNHAM), from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9101) granting an increase of pension to James W. Loomis, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also (for Mr. BURKETT), from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10267) granting an increase of pension to David W. Farington, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. McLAURIN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. FOSTER on the 16th instant, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to return to the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana the money taken from that bank by the military order of June 19, 1862, intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

LICENSED OFFICERS OF VESSELS.

Mr. GALLINGER. For the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] I report back favorably from the Committee on Commerce with amendments the bill (S. 6355) concerning licensed officers of vessels, and I will ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments of the Committee on Commerce were, on page 1, line 10, after the words "gross tons," to insert a comma; in line 15, after the words "gross tons," to insert a comma; and on page 2, line 1, after the words "for hire," to insert a comma; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4438 of the Revised Statutes be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4438. The boards of local inspectors shall license and classify the masters, chief mates, and second and third mates, if in charge of a watch, engineers, and pilots of all steam vessels, and the masters and chief mates of sail vessels of over 700 gross tons, and all other vessels of over 100 gross tons, carrying passengers for hire. It shall be unlawful to employ any person, or for any person to serve, as a master, chief mate, engineer, or pilot of any steamer or as master of any sail vessel of over 700 gross tons or of any other vessel of over 100 gross tons carrying passengers for hire, who is not licensed by the inspectors; and anyone violating this section shall be liable to a penalty of $100 for each offense."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT STREET RAILWAYS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6147) authorizing changes in certain street-railway tracks within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, to report it favorably with amendments, and I submit a report thereon. I wish to say that this bill proposes legislation which will enable the existing street-railway companies to get their tracks to the new Union Station. I understand the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] desires to make a statement concerning the matter, but I hope, notwithstanding the stress of the business before the Senate, unanimous consent will be given that this bill be acted on at the present time. It is exceedingly important.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill just read? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, this is the bill, or at least a part of the bill, which came from the Committee on the District of Columbia some three or four weeks ago and was placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. For a question.

Mr. PATTERSON. It is quite possible that this bill will bring on considerable argument, and I would suggest that the business which was to be taken up immediately on the conclusion of the routine business this morning be taken up and disposed of, and that we get that out of the way. I know the Senator from Pennsylvania is very anxious to have this done. I think it would be better to allow this bill to go over for the present and take it up a little later by unanimous consent, if it shall be determined to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that I was absent from the Chamber the latter part of Saturday, and I did not know what arrangement had been made. I have not had time to look at the RECORD. I do not wish to interfere with any arrangement that has been made for the proceedings of to-day. I am anxious to have this bill acted on, and I had hoped it would not take many minutes. But I will ask that the bill may lie over, to be taken up after the routine morning business to-morrow.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I only wish to say that I have several amendments to offer to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go to the Calendar. It has been read.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the bill may be taken up after the routine morning business to-morrow.

Mr. NELSON. That will interfere with the arrangement which was made Saturday. We are to take up the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal bill immediately after the conclusion of the morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request of the Senator from New Hampshire is that the bill mentioned be taken up after the routine morning business on to-morrow. Is there objection to the request. The Chair hears none.

Mr. TILLMAN. I suggest that the Senator from North Dakota should offer his amendments and have them printed, so that we can see what is proposed in the way of a change.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that is right.

Mr. TILLMAN. It will add to the knowledge of the situation which Senators who are interested in the matter will have.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think that is a very good suggestion. In compliance with the request of the Senator from South Carolina, I offer the amendments, and I ask that they may be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota proposes certain amendments, which will be printed and lie on the table.

PROPOSED RULE AS TO CONFERENCE REPORTS.

Mr. BAILEY. Several days ago I introduced an amendment to the rules and asked that it might lie upon the table. At that time I thought probably I would have something to say about it, but it seems generally accepted as a proper amendment, and I will ask that it be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Texas on the 4th instant, relative to a proposed rule as to conference reports, will be referred to the Committee on Rules, as requested.

FORFEITURE OF RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. CARTER. I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15513) to declare and enforce the forfeiture provided by section 4 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, on page 2, line 10, after the word "progressing," to insert the words "in good faith;" in line 12, page 2, after the word "railroad," to strike out the words "for three years after such approval;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That each and every grant of right of way and station grounds heretofore made to any railroad corporation under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States," where such railroad has not been constructed and the period of five years next following the location of said road, or any section thereof, has now expired, shall be, and hereby is, declared forfeited to the United States, to the extent of any portion of such located line now remaining unconstructed, and the United States hereby resumes the full title to the lands covered thereby freed and discharged from such easement, and the forfeiture hereby declared shall, without need of further assurance or conveyance, inure to the benfit of any owner or owners of land heretofore conveyed by the United States subject to any such grant of right of way or station grounds: Provided, That in any case under this act where construction of the railroad is progressing in good faith at the date of the approval of this act the forfeiture declared in this act shall not take effect as to such line of railroad.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6255) to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved April 26, 1906.

Mr. BURROWS. I wish to inquire if the morning business has been concluded?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not been concluded.

Mr. BURROWS. Let us have the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are still in order.

Mr. KNOX. I rose to inquire if the morning business has been closed?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not been concluded.

BRANCH LIBRARY IN TAKOMA PARK.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6406) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to accept donations of money and land for the establishment of a branch library in the District of Columbia, to establish a commission to supervise the erection of a branch library building in said District, and to provide for the suitable maintenance of said branch, to report it favorably with amendments, and I ask for its present consideration. It will take but a moment to pass it, and I hope consent will be given.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments of the Committee on the District of Columbia were, on page 2, line 4, before the name "Andrew Carnegie," to strike out "Mr.;" and in line 5, after the word "Carnegie," to strike out the words "on the conditions aforesaid;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to accept from Andrew Carnegie a donation not exceeding $30,000 for the purpose of erecting a suitable branch library building in Takoma Park, subject to the approval of the Commissioners and the public library trustees, and to accept conveyance of unencumbered land considered suitable by the said Commissioners and library trustees as a site for a branch library for Takoma Park. And authority is hereby conferred upon a commission, to consist of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the chairman of the committee on branch libraries of the library trustees, and the librarian of the Washington public library, to supervise the erection of said branch library building: Provided, That such branch library building shall not be opened for public use until Congress shall hereafter provide for the necessary expenses of maintaining said branch library when the same shall be completed and ready for such use.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the preamble be stricken out.

The motion was agreed to.

HAROLD L. JACKSON.

Mr. BULKELEY. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4965) authorizing the appointment of Harold L. Jackson, a captain on the retired list of the Army, as a major on the retired list of the Army, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Harold L. Jackson, now a captain on the retired list of the Army, to be a major on the retired list of the Army, with the rank and pay of that office.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF NATIONAL BANKS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there are no concurrent resolutions, the morning business is closed, and——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to some matters connected with the resolution which I offered some time ago, which is now pending before the Committee on Finance, and with the permission of the Senate I will ask to have the resolution I submitted on April 16 read again, in order to make some statements in regard thereto.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest that the morning business is closed, and under the unanimous-consent agreement made on Saturday——

Mr. TILLMAN. The Chair had not announced that the morning business was closed when I rose and addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair had announced it, but the Senator evidently did not hear it. Without objection——

Mr. TILLMAN. Then, I addressed the Chair as he made the announcement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. NELSON. This is not strictly morning business. While I dislike to object to the Senator, I am very anxious to have the ship-canal bill disposed of, inasmuch as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] is obliged to leave the city to-morrow and can only be here to-day. I trust the Senator will let the resolution go over.

Mr. TILLMAN. I can not let it go over, for the reason that to-morrow the Committee on Finance will consider the resolution referred to it, and I wanted to lay before the Senate some facts in regard to this situation.

Of course, the Senator understands that if he gets the bill up I can then speak on the resolution that I want to discuss in the time that is devoted to the bill which will be under consideration. I do not think anything will be gained by trying to shut me off. I do not want to be cross or at all obstructive, but I have something to say and I submit that unless I am ruled out of order I should like to have the resolution read and to make a few observations upon it—not very long.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina requests the reading of the resolution. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. TILLMAN April 16, 1906, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be directed to inquire whether or not the national banks have made contributions in aid of political committees, and if so to what extent and why the facts have not been discovered by the Comptroller of the Currency; and whether or not such contributions have been embezzlements, abstractions, or willful misapplications of the funds of the banks which call for restitutions and criminal prosecutions. Said committee is also directed to inquire whether or not the national banks of Chicago have recently engaged in transactions beyond their lawful powers in connection with the recent failure of a bank in that city, and whether such failure involved illegalities and crimes; and also to inquire whether the national banks in Ohio have been in the habit of paying large sums of money in a secret and illicit manner to the county treasurers of Ohio as a compensation to said treasurers for making deposits of public money with such banks; and to report the facts to the Senate and the opinion of the committee whether any legal proceedings should be instituted on account of the transactions disclosed; and whether the public interest requires any amendments of the existing national banking laws.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Finance in the Chamber.

Mr. HALE. He was called out for a moment. He will be here very soon.

Mr. TILLMAN. I presume he can read what little I have to say in the RECORD.

The other day when I brought this matter up the Senator waved aside, so to speak, the part of the resolution which deals with contributions to campaign committees as having been disposed of by the Senate by the passage of Senate bill 4563. That bill prohibits contributions by national banks or any corporations organized by authority of Congress to campaign committees and provides for punishing them. But the House of Representatives has not taken up Senate bill 4563, and I seriously doubt whether it will be considered by that body during this session, if at all.

I am pretty sure that the national banks and other corporations which have been the main sources of campaign contributions to the Republican national committee will not be hampered, if it can help it, by the House passing the Senate bill, at least not until after the next election.

It is for the purpose of directing the attention of the country to this great abuse, this crime, so to speak, that I mention this part of the resolution as an important one which needs investigation, even though the House should pass Senate bill 4563, and for this reason, Mr. President: The contributions which are acknowledged to have been made by national banks to campaign committees are clearly unlawful——

Mr. FORAKER rose.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will yield to the Senator in a moment.

It is acknowledged that they have made such contributions, and I offered to produce proofs that in Pittsburg in 1896 they did make such contributions. It is with a view to providing data on which the Attorney-General may institute suit against the directors and other officers who have misapplied national-bank funds and have them make restitution that I want the investigation.

It is, as I said, problematical whether the House will consider this bill at this session or whether it will ever pass. Therefore I want to direct the attention of the Senate and of the country to the fact that there is a bill of this character pending, which ought to receive attention, and which should become a law as soon as possible. At least, that is our judgment. It passed here unanimously. I hardly expect that the Committee on Finance, when it comes to consider this resolution, will be willing to make any move in the line of ascertaining the facts, or to compel restitution, or to punish these offenders. I imagine that that committee will probably, if it does anything, confine itself to a partial investigation of the other branches of the resolution, and leave the past sins of national banks and their directors with immunity; that they will dip them in the "immunity bath," or leave them in the "immunity bath," without bringing out the facts. It is not with the view to do more than call attention to this bill and its importance so as to possibly excite public attention to act on the House of Representatives that I allude to that feature of this resolution.

But there is another feature of this resolution, Mr. President, that, in my judgment, is very important. Three or four days ago, some time in the past week, the Committee on Finance reported House bill 8973, "to amend section 5200, Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to national banks," in which it was provided:

SEC. 5200. The total liabilities to any association, of any person, or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of a company or firm the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed one-tenth part of the amount of the capital stock of such associations, actually paid in and unimpaired and one-tenth part of its unimpaired surplus fund.

The Senate Committee on Finance reported to strike out the proviso which declared:

Provided, however, That the total of such liabilities shall in no event exceed 20 per cent of the capital stock of the association.

And a provision was inserted increasing the percentage to 30. I understand the House of Representatives has accepted that Senate amendment, and that the bill will soon become a law.

Mr. President, this is probably a valuable piece of legislation, and one which will, in most cases, be beneficent; but I call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]—who is now in the Chamber, I am glad to see—to the fact that under existing law and under the bill which the Senate passed, and which will soon be enacted into law, and which I have just read, there is no provision by which the disobedience of this inhibition is punishable; in other words, while Congress in the past has provided that no national bank shall loan more than 10 per cent of its capital stock to any one individual or corporation, and the other House has recently amended it so as to provide that it shall loan no more than 10 per cent of its capital stock and one-tenth of its surplus funds, that has been increased by the Senate to 30 per cent of the capital stock of the association. It would seem—and I am sorry that it did not occur to me at the time to suggest this to the chairman of the Committee on Finance—that this would be a proper place to put in a provision which would make it a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment, for any officer of a bank, or a director in charge of its affairs, to disobey this provision.

What is the existing statute in regard to the disobedience of that 10 per cent prohibition as originally enacted? Simply that the bank shall be liable to liquidation and the forfeiture of its charter; that is all. It does not matter how much or in how great a degree this provision of law is transgressed; the only thing that is now provided in the way of punishment for this transgression is simply that the bank shall forfeit its charter and be closed out of business; but so far as I know, if this has ever been done, I have not heard of it. The Senator from Rhode Island perhaps can inform me whether any bank has ever been liquidated and its charter forfeited because of its transgressions.

Mr. ALDRICH. I know of no case in which that has been done.

Mr. TILLMAN. And I have not heard of any.

Mr. ALDRICH. Nor do I know of any case in which it has been necessary.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, I only call attention to the fact that if this had been thought necessary by the Comptroller of the Currency when he discovered it, and if there were a provision of law which would punish the officers of the bank for not obeying it, we would probably have practically no story to tell of the absolute embezzlement of the entire assets and capital stock and everything else of various banks that have failed in the United States.

I recall that in the case of the Maverick Bank, at Boston, in 1892, the officers of that bank had practically loaned to themselves under one subterfuge and another the entire assets, deposits, and everything else, I believe, that they had, and that bank was liquidated as insolvent. I do not know that anybody connected with it has ever been punished, although there was an investigation to find out the facts in that case; but I do know that in the report, which was framed by the Senate Finance Committee, two members of which were John G. Carlisle and Calvin S. Brice, the facts were brought out that this bank had been wrecked by this very failure of the Comptroller of the Currency to watch, through his examiners, and see that this provision prohibiting the loaning of more than 10 per cent to any one individual was carried out. This leads me up to the balance of this resolution in connection with the Chicago banks.

Mr. President, the committee, as I said, I suppose will investigate the situation in regard to the Chicago National Bank and the other transactions by the Clearing House Association of Chicago in connection therewith. I take it for granted, in accordance with the long-continued practice of the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, that we shall have from that office a report that will practically say "nothing criminal has been done; there is nothing blamable; everything is justifiable, and eminently proper; in fact, the clearing house was doing a great act of financiering, saving a panic," and all that kind of thing. I do not know what the Comptroller will say, but I want to bring out some facts in connection with that failure that will show what the Comptroller ought to say and will show what the Comptroller ought to have done long ago.

For instance, some days ago—perhaps the day after I brought this matter up in the Senate last week—a statement was made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] that every depositor had been paid; and I believe he stated—if I am not correct he will correct me—that every stockholder would be paid in time. The day after that, two of the Members of the House of Representatives, who are members of the Committee on Banking and Currency, came to my committee room with a copy of testimony taken before that committee in May in relation to this bank failure; the evidence being that of Mr. W. T. Fenton, president of the National Bank of the Republic, and a delegate from the Chicago Clearing House. I ask that the Secretary read it, in order that we may know just what has been done in Chicago.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Extracts from statement made before House Committee on Banking and Currency on Wednesday, May 25, 1906, by W. T. Fenton, president of the National Bank of the Republic, Chicago, Ill., and delegate from the Chicago Clearing House.

The banks of Chicago were called together on a Sunday; the members of the clearing house stayed up all night Sunday night; they found the Chicago National Bank was hopelessly insolvent. Not a member of the clearing house suspected that there was anything wrong with it.

Mr. WEEKS. Was it insolvent?

Mr. FENTON. Yes. The members of the Chicago Clearing House, after sitting up all night to avert what they thought would be a calamity, assumed the obligations of that bank and took the bank's assets. The immediate cause of the failure of that concern was overloans to concerns in which the president of the bank was interested. Correspondence was shown at that meeting of the clearing house running back over a period of three years—and I am not saying this to cast reflections on the Comptroller's department or on any of the examiners or officials—but here are the facts, that three years before that bank closed the Comptroller's department knew that the president of the institution had loaned $5,000,000 to a concern in which he was interested; and by the night we took over the assets he had used $15,000,000 of the assets of that bank. And here is one of the results of the familiarity with the violation of this law. It had been done so long, and had been overlooked and temporized with until it grew and grew, and finally absorbed the entire institution; and we were called upon, in order to maintain the financial integrity of our city, to liquidate that institution, and take its assets and assume its debts.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, we have here the testimony of a member of the clearing house and the president of one of the great banks of Chicago, that the Comptroller of the Currency knew long ago that Mr. Walsh had loaned to himself practically, certainly to a railroad of which he was the chief owner and the controller, $5,000,000, and yet nothing was done about it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am sure the Senator does not want to make that statement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think, upon reflection, the Senator will not say that the Comptroller of the Currency knew that a national bank had loaned to one man $5,000,000, and that no action was taken.

Mr. TILLMAN. I say no actual results followed any action under the law as it now stands. The only thing he could have done would have been to notify the president and directors: "The statute provides that you shall not loan but 10 per cent; you must have this thing stopped. Collect that money, and get yourselves straight."

Mr. ALDRICH. The transactions of Mr. Walsh in connection with the national banks of Chicago and the facts in relation to that matter, have been reported by the Comptroller to the Department of Justice for its action, and the transactions are now in the courts. That has been well understood.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the transactions of Mr. Walsh in regard to the Bank of Chicago are criminal in some phases and in others they are possibly mere transgressions which are not punishable by law, except by declaring that the bank must be liquidated and closed up and cease business as a bank, as I have already pointed out.

I will read to the Senator from Rhode Island section 5239 of the Revised Statutes—with which, of course, he is very familiar—showing that some things have been done that are unlawful and that are punishable by the courts:

If the directors of any national banking association shall knowingly violate, or knowingly permit any of the officers, agents, or servants of the association to violate, any of the provisions of this title, all the rights, privileges, and franchises of the association shall be thereby forfeited.

Now, does the Senator pretend to say that the forfeiture of the charter of that bank is not declared as soon as the Comptroller finds out that the president of the bank has loaned himself $5,000,000?

Mr. ALDRICH. I imagine if the loan were repaid in any way——

Mr. TILLMAN. It has not been repaid, but it has been added to by $10,000,000 more. So that, according to the testimony which has been produced by Mr. Fenton before the House Committee on Banking and Currency, Mr. Walsh not only loaned himself $5,000,000 three years ago—and no steps were taken by the Comptroller of Currency to forfeit the charter of his bank, as was required by law—by Mr. Walsh went on and loaned himself $10,000,000 more, making $15,000,000 in all—in fact, clearing the bank out, making it absolutely insolvent, and causing the destruction of all its assets, so to speak.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not know whether or not the Senator from South Carolina is engaged in the trial of this case, but surely he is pronouncing judgment.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from South Carolina is not engaged in the trial of this case. The Senator from South Carolina is trying to get the Committee on Finance to act or to appoint a subcommittee to bring out the facts. That is all the Senator from South Carolina is trying to do, and I do not think it is justifiable for the Committee on Finance, or its chairman, to pooh-pooh the transaction and to say that no harm has been done; that no law has been violated, and that everything is sweet and wholesome, when I can prove, as I will before I get through, that Mr. Walsh has in several instances violated the criminal law and wherein the entire clearing-house association of Chicago has also violated the statute.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have stated already that the transactions of Mr. Walsh, whatever they were, are now before the courts of the United States, referred there by the Department of Justice at the instance of the Comptroller of the Currency; and I assume that neither the Senate nor the Senator from South Carolina will enter here on a discussion of a matter which is now being examined into by the courts of the country.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let me read the remainder of section 5239, and perhaps the Senator from Rhode Island will see it in a different light:

Such violation—

The violation I have just spoken of—

Such violation shall, however, be determined and adjudged by a proper circuit, district, or Territorial court of the United States, in a suit brought for that purpose by the Comptroller of the Currency, in his own name, before the association shall be declared dissolved. And in cases of such violation every director who participated in or assented to the same shall be held liable in his personal and individual capacity for all damages which the association, its shareholders, or any other person shall have sustained in consequence of such violation.

Is the Senator from Rhode Island prepared to say that the Comptroller of the Currency has brought the suit in his own name, as the law provides and compels him to do?

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, it is fair to presume that the Comptroller of the Currency has discharged his duty——

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course.

Mr. ALDRICH. In the premises, whatever it may be. I should be very unwilling to believe that the present Comptroller of the Currency has not fully done his duty.

Mr. TILLMAN. But suppose the Senator should appoint a committee to investigate and they should find out that, unfortunately, following the bad precedent that has been established and has been going on for twenty years and possibly thirty years, he has not done so, then what?

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator from South Carolina will state definitely that the Comptroller of the Currency has violated his duty, has violated the statute, and has been guilty of malfeasance in office, I have no doubt the Senate will appoint a committee to examine into the facts of the matter. I do not understand that up to this time the Senator has made any such statement or made any such charge.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I will give the Senator some more facts, then, in relation to the Walsh failure, so that he can have all the light he wants, or, at least, he will have enough light to probably induce him, either by a subcommittee or the whole Committee on Finance, to take the matter up, investigate it, and report to the Senate just what the committee finds. I read from a prepared statement sent to me, which I received in the mail this morning, and which goes more into detail as to just what has occurred and what the situation is:

CHICAGO, June 16, 1906.

Senator BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: My knowledge of the Walsh banks is derived from the public press and verified by some of my acquaintances in the banks.

The details of the transaction are jealously guarded by the clearing-house committee, but should be fully known by the Comptroller of the Currency, and if there is anything at all in the Federal inspection of national banks these facts ought to be easily obtainable in Washington. To quote from a long statement in the Chicago Tribune of March 3, 1906, which I herewith inclose, with the request that you return it, the capital of Walsh's banks was, Chicago National, $1,000,000; Home Savings, $100,000 (from Chicago Securities, 1905); Equitable Trust, $500,000, making a total capital of the three banks of $1,600,000. The deposits of the Chicago National were about $20,000,000; of the Home Savings, $4,000,000, and of the Equitable Trust, $2,000,000, making total deposits of $26,000,000.

Both the State law and the Federal law provide that no bank shall lend over 10 per cent of its capital to any one borrower. According to this report there was loaned by Walsh to Walsh $15,000,000, or 800 per cent of the capital of the combined banks. These loans were ingeniously handled, so as, if possible, to avoid liability. The banks carried a vast amount of bonds of his railroads, coal mines, and stone quarries, and in some cases an amount stated to be $2,000,000 was loaned on notes signed by the names but not with the signatures of people who either were ignorant of their names being used or, at any rate, had no interest in the transaction.

I will state here that in the Maverick Bank failure I find that this same process was followed and that the names of bell boys and other underlings about the bank were signed to notes. Of course the Committee on Finance can discover whether this man's statements are true or not.

Bonds were put up as collateral for these loans. It is for the legal authorities to determine the legal aspects of this signing of other men's names.

It was contended by Secretary Shaw, as quoted in the Chicago press, and not denied by him, that Walsh, in this system of finance, did nothing beyond what most banks do in making excess loans, for which, as I understand, there is no criminal liability, although directors may be held personally liable should loss accrue on such excess loans. But the difference in degree is so great as to make a difference in kind.

Now, as to the present status of the situation. The banks, having stepped in and having taken the assets of the Walsh institutions, paid off the Walsh depositors as they agreed to do, and thereby released the stockholders of the Walsh banks from the stockholders' liability. Certain of the directors of the Walsh banks put up security said to amount to $4,700,000, but probably more nearly worth $3,000,000, to be used by the banks to make up any deficiency that might result.

The banks do not own all of the bonds of the Chicago Southern and Southern Indiana railways, certain of these bonds having been sold prior to the commercial earthquake. The stock of the two roads is trusteed in the hands of a lawyer friendly to Walsh, named A. W. Green. There having been no default on interest up to date, there are no foreclosure proceedings, no receiver, and it rests with Messrs. Walsh and Green to name the price at which the railroads can be sold. Should these railroads bring a price of $22,000,000, it is believed that these obligations to the banks would be canceled, principal and interest, without recourse to the deficiency guaranty fund. Anything less than this would use up the deficiency fund as well as the capital stock of the banks. I am informed that no bid has yet been made for these roads.

The construction of the two southern roads is of an excellent character, but they are unfortunate in not being joined together to make a through route. It is not to the interest of rival roads to buy these roads and link them together. Therefore it is hard to market them in their incomplete state. It is estimated that it will take $2,000,000 to complete the system, when the line would at once have a much greater value. It can not be stated that Mr. Walsh was guilty of bad judgment in locating these roads which may and probably will eventually, by the use of considerable money, be an asset of great value—whether of sufficient value to pay off all indebtedness or not I have no means of knowing. This, however, is not a point at issue, except as affecting the judgment of the Chicago banks in going to the rescue of the situation.

I would not for a moment criticise the fine public spirit as well as the realization of the necessity for self-preservation shown by the bankers in that crisis. For, in spite of the political reputation of Walsh and his reputation as a citizen, he had in the panic of 1893 shown himself a conservative banker, and the Chicago National Bank was regarded as eminently sound, although criticised for the large proportion of public funds in its deposits. Had the other banks allowed him to collapse, there would have been a bank panic in Chicago of the most severe type, and to avert this was worth a large sacrifice.

After realizing on what assets could be turned into cash, including the bank building, there is still due to the Chicago banks from the Walsh aggregation between $11,000,000 and $12,000,000. This is being carried by the State and national banks of Chicago, having an aggregate capital of $40,000,000, and is prorated among them on the basis of their capital, so that at the present time more than 25 per cent of the bank capital of Chicago (excepting a few minor institutions) is tied up by this Walsh failure.

I noticed the statement of Senator HOPKINS that the stockholders of the Walsh banks would receive par for their stock. There being no market for this stock, it is impossible to determine its value, but the surplus funds of the three banks were wiped out, to the detriment of the stockholders, and there seems no probability of the stock paying out much of anything. These surplus funds, according to published statements in a reliable publication, known as "Chicago Securities," for 1905, amounted to about $2,000,000, as follows:

Chicago National surplus and undivided profits	$1,402,444.23
Equitable Trust surplus and undivided profits	446,317.33
Home Savings Bank surplus and undivided profits	149,618.11
Total	1,998,379.67

It would seem to me, whether or not any legal crime had been committed, that his stockholders had been abominably dealt with.

Although not having access to the data held by the clearing-house committee, which committee is unquestionably doing all in its power to alleviate the situation and pull through with the minimum of loss, I feel sure, from talks with a number of bankers, that they would be extremely glad to accept a loss of from 5 to 10 per cent and be rid of the mess.

Had Walsh succeeded in his plans and made a profit, that profit would have been his and would not have redounded to the benefit of either his depositors or his stockholders. As he failed, it was merely incidental that the other banks saved his depositors. His stockholders certainly lost. This was a colossal game of "heads I win, tails you lose," and if Senator HOPKINS is correctly quoted as stating that it was to the credit of Mr. Walsh's bank that the depositors were paid he is overlooking the fact that they were paid by others in the face of Mr. Walsh's delinquency.

How this cumulative, long-drawn-out financial scheme, which, whether criminal or not, was opposed to every principle of fairness and responsible finance, so long escaped the scrutiny of the Federal Government it is difficult to understand. It may be that Walsh has evaded all criminal statutes, but to an outsider it would look as though there must have been either collusion with bank examiners or some strange bookkeeping. The signing of names of others to dummy notes has a painful resemblance to an offense recognized by law. The loaning to himself, through various subterfuges, of such a vast sum of other people's money does not create a pleasant impression, and whether or not he properly exercised his trust to his stockholders brings up another set of questions.

The average embezzler takes his employer's money to gamble or speculate with it. If he wins, the employer gets it back; if he loses, the employer takes the loss. Is a bank president an employee of his stockholders?

The statements above made are as nearly correct as can be given without access to the data of the clearing house. They have been published and reiterated in the Chicago papers without denial.

Should there be any denial made, a Senate committee, properly authorized to subpœna witnesses, could obtain these facts and many more.

Yours, truly,

WILLIAM KENT.

Mr. William Kent is a director in one of the State banks. That is all I know about him. But when he gives his name and writes a statement of facts, such as I have read to the Senate, it stands to reason that it is the duty of the Finance Committee to first call on the Comptroller's department to find out how much of this statement is true and how much is false, or about how much he does not know anything; and, secondly, to consider very seriously, I hope, whether or not the question of the liability of the directors and of Mr. Walsh should be left entirely to the discretion of the Department of Justice and nothing be done toward liquidating the Chicago bank.

Now, there is another statement which I have somewhere—I do not recollect where it is; I think perhaps it is in one of the papers—with respect to Mr. Walsh the night after the collapse, when the Clearing House Association sat up all night examining into the condition, and, in order to avert a panic, decided that they would take the bonds of these railroads and pay the depositors and prevent a panic, thereby doing a great public act of beneficence and possibly saving themselves from disaster, because if confidence was once lost and the banks, with their enormous deposits, were called on by the depositors to pay up, they would not have been able to do it. Therefore they would have had a very disastrous condition in financial circles in Chicago. But without presuming to criticise the first action of the Clearing House Association, this remarkable fact can be learned, I think—in fact, Mr. Kent states it: That Mr. Walsh was not called on by the banks at all to deliver the stock of the railroads, but only the bonds. I presume they thought the stock was worthless, but it turns out that Mr. Walsh has absolute control of the situation, from the fact that as long as he pays the interest on the bonds which the banks have taken or bought, or which they had to take to prevent a panic, the banks can not liquidate this "mess," as it is termed, and can not get themselves straight, and can not get back their 25 per cent of capital stock thus loaned to one concern contrary to law and use it in their legitimate business of banking; and Mr. Walsh is talking about going to Europe, the papers say. He feels so safe in his sharp manipulation and management of this collapse of his banking institution and possibly of the wreck of his railroads, and so little uneasy in regard to the action of the district attorney, that he wants to go off for the summer to recoup his health, I suppose, and enjoy himself.

The question is, Why does not the district attorney press this matter to the attention of the grand jury? Why is Mr. Walsh, a one-time millionaire, any different from any other man who has broken the law? Why can not the courts be called upon to determine once for all just what Mr. Walsh has done that is unlawful, and if he has transgressed any of the criminal statutes let the jury determine it, and let the law take its course toward punishing him? If he has forged names, that certainly is a crime. And then there is the transgression of lending more than five millions three years ago, and then, finally, fifteen millions, all to himself or to his railroads; and the national banks, not knowing of this situation, were called on suddenly to face a crisis and probably did the best they could. I am not criticising them.

But I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to section 5136 of the Revised Statutes as showing what is regarded by the law as legitimate banking:

Seventh. To exercise by its board of directors, or duly authorized officers or agents, subject to law, all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking; by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt; by receiving deposits; by buying and selling exchange, coin, and bullion; by loaning money on personal security; and by obtaining, issuing, and circulating notes according to the provisions of this title.

Mr. President, I desire to make two points in regard to the illegality and lawlessness of this Chicago bank muddle, and in order to put them in the form of a syllogism based on the facts I have tried to bring out, and which I think the committee would very soon find to be absolutely correct, I will state them in this way:

1. A national bank in a city may join two State banks, the three being authorized to do a banking business only, and they may invest $10,000,000—more than all their capital and surplus—in securities of two or three railroad companies; and may become utterly insolvent; and this kind of national banking can not be held to be illegal, and nobody can be criminally punished for what has been done.

That is one logical proposition which I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will consider in connection with the suggestion I made, whether the banking laws should not be amended by providing a personal punishment of imprisonment for disobedience to this provision prohibiting the loan of more than 10 per cent of its capital to any one concern, and now under the new provision which was passed here two or three days ago, more than 30 per cent.

The next syllogism has to deal with the clearing-house situation:

2. The national and other banks of the same city, having a capital of $40,000,000, and authorized to do a banking business only, may jointly purchase the ten millions of dead assets of the three insolvent banks, making 25 per cent of their capital thus invested; and this kind of national banking is not illegal; and the Comptroller of the Currency says it is in the highest degree praiseworthy.

I take it for granted the Comptroller will so state, because, as I said, it is the custom of the Comptroller's Department to minimize and pooh-pooh any transgression or appearance of "wild-cat banking" that the national banks may engage in, and to leave them largely alone until the conditions grow so desperate that he must step forward, when it is too late.

I do not care to say anything more, Mr. President. It seems to me that this is eminently a case for investigation by the Committee on Finance, with a view to ascertaining whether the facts I have brought out as coming from Mr. Fenton, through the Committee on Banking and Currency in the House, and the statement of Mr. Kent, and the statements which have been taken largely from the Chicago papers and not denied, are correct, and if so, that the committee should authorize a subcommittee to take up the matter during the recess of Congress or as soon as practicable and ascertain all the facts and report what is necessary to prevent other transactions of this character, and to punish those who have broken the law.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, the statement made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] illustrates as perfectly as it ever has come under my observation the saying of the old English poet:

A little learning is a dangerous thing;
Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring.

I am sure if the Senator from South Carolina, instead of being misled by the statement of Billy Kent and some newspaper statements that are equally irresponsible, had gone to leading citizens like Mr. Eckels, who was once Comptroller of the Currency and one of the great leaders of the party to which the Senator belongs; or to Mr. Forgan, of the First National Bank of Chicago, who is also a member of the Senator's political organization; or to Mr. Dawes, who was once Comptroller of the Currency, and is now at the head of a great State bank; or to Mr. Orson B. Smith, one of the best known financiers of the country, either East or West, he never would have indulged in this tirade against the clearing-house banks which have taken in charge the assets of the Chicago National Bank. I say he would not, unless he has a disposition to misrepresent and unless he desires, regardless of the facts, to make sensational statements that will depress the value of the assets which are now held by those banks, so that by his act possibly a loss may be made. I am not going to assume that he wishes to bring about any such result.

But if he had been entirely frank and candid and had wanted the chairman of the Finance Committee and that committee to take action in the premises, why did he not wait until to-morrow morning, when he knows that the committee will meet, and present to them the facts, if he has any, that he thinks are of a character that should be brought to their attention and upon which they could predicate action, instead of presenting them in the Senate, where they go into the press of the country from Wall street to the Pacific coast?

These actions on the part of the Senator from South Carolina, it seems to me, are the subject of just criticism. If his object is to injure the Chicago banks and exploit himself at the expense of the facts, he could not have taken a better course than he has taken here. He could not have made any statement which could have resulted in the desired result more than those he has made here. And I say to the Senator from South Carolina that he could not serve the interests of Wall street and the parties who desire to get control of the Walsh railroads and other interests better than by taking the course he has taken here this morning. They wish conditions to exist which will make it difficult for the Chicago banks to dispose of those great interests. They wish the conditions such that those properties will not bring their full value.

Now, Mr. President, if the Senator from South Carolina had waited until to-morrow, I think I am in possession of facts that warrant me in making the statement that he would have been told by the Comptroller of the Currency that the action of the Chicago banks is not in violation of any law whatever, and that instead of being the subject of censure, their acts should be commended, as they have been commended by all of the leading bankers of this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. They have not only violated no law, Mr. President, but they have shown a degree of public spirit and patriotism which place them above any just criticism. I have named a few of these men, who are known over the entire country. They are the men from whom I have gained the facts I have presented from time to time to the Senate on this question, which has been raised repeatedly by the Senator from South Carolina.

I do not go to men like Billy Kent. I wish the Senator knew him as well as I know him. I wish he knew the financial and civic standing of Billy Kent as well as I know it. If he did, I do not believe he would have read the letter that he has read here to-day in criticism of such men as Mr. Eckels, Mr. Forgan, Mr. Smith, and Mr. Dawes, the foremost men in the second city on the continent. I do not believe that in all his zeal in the cause of reform of national banks he would take the word or the statements of this man, who admits that he is interested in no bank that belongs to the clearing house there, who admits that he has no inside knowledge, who admits that he is an entire outsider, and present them here in the Senate for the purpose of criticising the foremost citizens in the city of Chicago.

Now, as I said, if the Senator wants the facts, I will be glad to have him go to Chicago and see Mr. Eckels. The Senator knows him personally. The Senator knows that what I say of him is but the living truth. If the Senator desires to know whether any law has been violated by these banks, let him go to such an authority. If Mr. Eckels, or men of the character I have mentioned, say that any law has been violated by the clearing-house banks, it will be far from me ever to raise my voice in protest or criticism of any effort to condemn such practices.

I have spoken upon this subject only because I have known from the character of these men that they are doing a great and a mighty work in the interest of honest finance, not only in Chicago, but also in the entire country; and I regret that the Senator from South Carolina, or any other Senator, should find it incumbent upon him to rise in his place in the Senate of the United States and denounce or criticise them without knowing the facts as they exist.

There is no secret with respect to what these men are doing or have done. This whole transaction is as open as the day; and the men who inaugurated this were led by one of the greatest business men of this generation—Mr. Marshall Field. When the facts with respect to the Chicago National Bank were made known, Mr. Field joined with other great financiers in the city of Chicago for the purpose of preventing a run upon the other banks of Chicago or a crisis in the financial affairs of that city or of the country. It was under his wise suggestion that the arrangement was made which exists to-day.

Mr. President, I have it from Mr. Eckels that they have assets enough not only to pay off all the depositors of the banks—as they have already been paid, as I understand—but to pay the book value of the stock to stockholders, and that there will be several million dollars left to go to Mr. Walsh in the end. Now, unless sensational scenes can be enacted in the Senate and other places to depress the value of these properties, the condition will be brought about as outlined to me by Mr. Eckels. Mr. John J. Mitchell, at the head of the Illinois Trust Company, a State corporation with deposits of a hundred million dollars, concurs in all these statements of Mr. Eckels, as I am informed. Where is there any point or place to criticise the action of those banks or the bankers who control them?

So far as the bank of Mr. Walsh is concerned, the statement that was read here from Mr. Fenton, president of one of the lesser banks in Chicago, is inaccurate in its language. Mr. Fenton said the bank was insolvent. He is not correct in that if he intended to convey the idea that there were not assets enough in the Walsh bank to pay all the depositors and to pay anybody who was interested in the bank, either directly or indirectly. If he means by the word "insolvent" that their assets were such that they did not have what bankers call "quick assets," so as to meet all the demands of depositors on a run on the bank, he would be correct; and that is the reason why the Chicago bankers met on this Sunday night and took over these assets and put cash enough in the bank to meet all the depositors. The Walsh bank did not have quick assets. But before the bankers put that money up they went over all the securities of the Walsh bank, and they took enough not only to make them absolutely safe, but a number of the directors put up, as shown by the letter of Mr. Kent, several million dollars of their private property, so as to "make assurance double sure" on that point.

The point of criticism where the Senator from South Carolina would be justified would be that the Chicago National Bank did loan more than 10 per cent of its capital to one person. But as has been stated by a high official, 70 per cent of the banks of the country have done that. The Senator must be familiar with the Chemical National Bank of New York, which has a capitalization of only $300,000, while it has a surplus of more than $7,000,000. It is an open secret that a man can go there with proper security and borrow an amount equal to the entire capitalization of the bank; and it has been done, as I have been informed. That is no criminal offense. That section of the law was passed by Congress years and years ago as a rule to guide banks. But as the banks have developed in the great commercial centers, it has been found that that provision of the law could not be successfully complied with; that the great commercial and industrial interests of the country were such as to demand from time to time more than 10 per cent of the capitalization of a bank; and hence by common custom, almost, the great banks in the commercial centers have loaned to customers whom they knew to be all right and who gave them gilt-edge securities, more than the statutory limit. Congress has come to see that that rule which was adopted years ago is not one that should be enforced against the banks to-day, and so the other day, under the leadership of the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], provision was made that 30 per cent of the capital could be loaned. If I mistake not, the Senator from South Carolina did not vote against that bill. So by that vote, if I am correct in my statement, he himself recognizes the fact that the rule of law adopted years ago is one which should not at the present time be enforced against the great banks in the commercial centers.

Now, one other word, and I am through. I am not here either to defend or to condemn Mr. Walsh. My acquaintance with him is much more limited than it is with men like Mr. Dawes, Mr. Eckels, and other Chicago bankers whom I might mention. I have known him only in a general way. My personal acquaintance has been limited to a few years. For many years he stood before the country as one of the great bankers and financial men of Chicago. It was a distinct shock to the entire community when it was learned that the assets of his bank were such that it was necessary for the bank to go into voluntary liquidation, and that is the reason why such men as Marshall Field came to the rescue and said that a man who had stood in the community as Mr. Walsh had stood should have the helping hand of the other great banks of Chicago, and that the Chicago National Bank should go into voluntary liquidation so as to save all the depositors, all the stockholders, and leave a handsome fortune to Mr. Walsh.

The Senator from South Carolina intimates in his speech that Mr. Walsh has violated some criminal law. That is a matter which I have not investigated. So I have no opinion either one way or the other upon the subject. But I will say this for Mr. Walsh: He claims that he has violated no criminal law, and to show his good faith in the premises I will say to the Senator from South Carolina that he has thrown his bank books and checks open to the Government inspectors, and the Government, through the Department of Justice, for weeks has been going over every item in the bank books to see whether there has been any violation of the criminal law. Mr. Walsh has stood ready to meet any charge of a violation of law. If not guilty, as he insists he is not, he has asked for this investigation that he may be vindicated from the aspersions of men who, while he is now in financial straits, are attempting to ruin his character and blight his future life.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, only a word. I wish to call attention to the fact that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], without the slightest provocation on my part or even the mention of his name, except incidentally as having been mistaken in one of his statements, indulges in more or less harsh language in regard to my action and all that kind of thing. I will let that pass. I am not trying to get up any exploitation of myself. I do not need any advertisement. I am pretty well advertised in the United States in one way and another, and I am not endeavoring to get any additional printer's ink used in connection with my name.

But I believe there have been some criminal transactions in regard to the Walsh failure. It is very easy for Mr. Walsh to prove his innocence in court if a grand jury shall find a true bill and force him to trial, provided he is innocent. It is also very easy for the Committee on Finance to make investigation and discover whether the Comptroller of the Currency has been negligent or whether he has merely followed a series of bad precedents or whether he has done anything that ought not to have been done or left any thing undone which it was his duty to do.

I have nothing against Mr. Walsh, because I never saw him and I do not know anything about him in a general way, except that he was a Democrat once, or he pretended to be, and he afterwards swapped politics, and that always left something of a bad taste in my mouth in regard to a man. But other people swap politics, and they are not altogether criminal or reprehensible in changing their views. It is every man's right to do it, if he wants to.

I say I have no personal concern in this matter whatever, but having started in on the question of investigating national banks in regard to campaign contributions, and while that subject was under consideration and I was hunting up evidence, which I afterwards found and presented to the Senate, this Walsh failure was called to my attention, along with the transactions in Cincinnati of national banks indulging in direct and indirect bribery of county treasurers, and looking into the law a little I thought I discovered that it was not sufficiently guarded in providing that banks that indulge in wild-cat speculations, like I call this, or beneficent financiering, as the Senator from Illinois calls it—whatever you call it I do not care, we will not have any row about the description of it, but I thought the examination by a committee with the possible suggestion of a punishment clause in the law would make a bank officer hesitate and think a good while before he transgressed with impunity this provision in regard to 10 per cent. Liberalize, if you want to, and broaden and increase the amount it is lawful to lend, but in the name of common sense and respect for the law, which we demand of all the small people in this country, let us compel the millionaires also to have regard for the law and obey it. That is all there is about it. Therefore, I thought it worth while to bring to the attention of the Committee on Finance in this way these facts which have come to my attention.

The Senator calls Mr. Kent "Billy Kent;" he must be a warm friend of his or something like that. Anyway Billy Kent may be an all-round liar or he may be the right kind of a man; I do not know; but Billy Kent is backed up in some of his statements by Mr. Fenton, who is president of one of the other banks and member of the clearing house. There is undoubtedly a great deal of smoke in Chicago in regard to the Walsh failure. There is no liquidation yet of the bank's assets to determine whether the Clearing House Association has lost or will lose money. If these banks are going into railroad building now, if they are going to complete these two roads and make a through route, and all that sort of thing, what becomes of the law which specifies what banking is and what it is legitimate for national banks to do? There ought to be some regard for a law, even among national banks, and that is all I had in view. I do not want to injure the financial standing of the Chicago banks. I do not want to create any distrust of their capacity and honesty and integrity of purpose. I have not said a word that would indicate any such desire as that. I have information that this $11,000,000, or such a matter, that they have loaned to Walsh's concern, or which is a part of the liability to which they are subject because of their taking Walsh's assets, is not more than 5 or 6 per cent of their total loans and that everything is all right. If it is true that the law has not been obeyed, and that is all there is about it, the law ought to be changed or else they ought to have the Comptroller of the Currency liquidate the banks that disobey the law. That is all there is about it so far as I am concerned.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, there are some reasons why I desire a brief executive session. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

LAKE ERIE AND OHIO RIVER SHIP CANAL.

Mr. NELSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 14396.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the business before the Senate under the unanimous-consent agreement.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14396) to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, to define the powers thereof, and to facilitate interstate commerce.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to lay the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] on the table. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, page 3, it is proposed to strike out the following proviso, beginning in line 14:

Provided, however, That the amount of debt created by the issue of bonds shall in no case exceed the amount of stock subscribed for and paid in in money, or property at its fair value.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, however, That the amount of debt created by the issue of bonds shall in no case exceed the amount of stock subscribed for and paid in in money at the face or par value of such stock, and such bonds shall neither be sold nor paid for at a greater discount than 5 per cent of their face or par value.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to lay on the table the amendment just read. The Secretary will call the roll.

So Mr. PATTERSON'S amendment was laid on the table.

PANAMA CANAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6191) to provide for the construction of a sea-level canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and the method of construction.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LAKE ERIE AND OHIO RIVER SHIP CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14396) to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, to define the powers thereof, and to facilitate interstate commerce.

Mr. PATTERSON. I offer as a substitute for section 22 of the bill what I send to the desk. Let the Secretary read the section.

The SECRETARY (reading)—

SEC. 22. That the corporation hereby created shall be subject, in the respective States in which it does business, to all the laws of said States regulating the taxation of foreign corporations.

In lieu of section 22 it is proposed to insert:

SEC. 22. That the corporation hereby created shall be subject, in the respective States in which it does business, to taxation upon its property and franchises as are other corporations.

Mr. NELSON. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the amendment ought not to be adopted, Mr. President.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator in charge of the bill [Mr. NELSON] states that it is satisfactory to him.

Mr. NELSON. I have conferred with the Senator from Pennsylvania about this matter, and he has no objection to the amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think it is a proper precedent to establish. I do not believe the States ought to be permitted to tax the franchises of a corporation created by Congress in the exercise of Federal power. The power to tax involves the power to destroy, and this seems to me to be something that ought not to be done any more than the Federal Government ought to tax the franchise of a State corporation. But, of course, if the Senator from Minnesota is willing to accept the amendment, I shall not contest it.

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not want to occupy any time in debating the amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] in regard to this amendment; and, if a vote is had on it, I shall vote against its adoption.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the amendment be again read, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] will be again stated.

The Secretary again read Mr. PATTERSON'S amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "company," in section 17, line 16, on page 12, it is proposed to insert "and approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission."

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, the bill provides that the rate of "tolls shall be equal to all persons, vessels, and goods under certain classifications to be established by the company." The amendment which I sent to the desk adds, after the word "company," the words "and approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission;" so that the establishment of the classification will require the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I propose this amendment, Mr. President, because this is a Federal charter, and I think it is desirable that, if this is to be accepted as a precedent, whenever we establish a Federal charter some provision of this kind in regard to the classification of freight should be fixed in the charter. There is no means by which equality in rate charges is evaded oftener than by an arbitrary change of classification. Any Senator who will take the trouble to read the investigations made by the Industrial Commission will understand how readily—an illustration is given in the volumes of that report—how readily and how frequently, arbitrarily, and wrongfully the railroads have in the past, by transferring an article from one classification to another, been able to increase the charge on those classifications most oppressively.

Without taking up further time of the Senate—and I have only said this much for the purpose of calling attention to the object of the amendment—I trust that we may now have a vote on it.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to have the amendment again read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] will be again stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 17, on page 12, line 16, after the word "company," it is proposed to insert "and approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission;" so that if amended it will read:

> Tolls shall be equal to all persons, vessels, and goods under certain classifications to be established by the company and approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment; but I wish to suggest to the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] that I do not know why, if we put this provision in, we should not make this canal subject to the interstate-commerce act. I say I have no objection to the amendment, because here Congress is granting this charter, it is exercising its proprietary right with respect to the charter, and it has a right to attach this or any other condition it may see fit to name. So that it is unlike the case of common carriers which are not created by an act of Congress. But if, as to the making of rates and charges, the canal is to be subjected to supervision by the Interstate Commerce Commission, why should it not be in every other respect? I have all the time thought—although I have not spent much time insisting upon it, for it has seemed to be useless—that all our waterways, canals, and rivers on which interstate commerce is carried should be under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission. For this reason, Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator will excuse me for just a moment.

While no one complains of the rates charged for water transportation, it is a notorious fact that as to the evils of discrimination, which are most seriously complained of in connection with interstate commerce, carriers on waterways practice discriminations in a more pronounced way than any other class of carriers. Boats are loading at Cincinnati, for instance, for New Orleans. They charge for freight certain rates that are recognized to be exacted from everybody until they find, two or three hours before they are about to sail, that they can not get a load otherwise, and then they load up with whatever they can get, no matter how low the rate may be, so that they can get freight. That is the practice in respect to water carriers almost everywhere.

So I see no objection, inasmuch as we are creating a corporation for building a ship canal, to making it subject to the provisions of the interstate-commerce law in so far as its provisions are applicable to carriers by water.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I rose simply to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the last paragraph of section 9, in which that very thing is done.

Mr. FORAKER. If it be done by section 9, it is hardly worth while to do it over again by this proposed amendment. I was assuming that there had not been any such provision. Section 9 reads as follows:

> That Congress hereby reserves the right to regulate——

Mr. CULBERSON. It is the last sentence of section 9.

Mr. FORAKER. I will read the entire section:

> SEC. 9. That Congress hereby reserves the right to regulate the tolls, fares, and rates to be charged by said company for the use of said canals; and the said company and the said canals and all transportation thereon shall be subject to all the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts supplemental thereto and amendatory thereof now or hereafter enacted.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that that covers the case completely.

Mr. MALLORY. There is no provision of law——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. FORAKER. I will, if the Senator will allow me to say just one word more. I want to apologize for not apparently being aware of that section, but I have been absent from the Senate for a day or two—compelled to be on account of committee business—and I have not been able to give special attention to this measure, and so I was not aware of that section.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Ohio is very far wrong in thinking that there is no provision of law that covers the subject of classification. Our rate bill does not, and there is no law that I know of that does confide to anybody the power to control classification. It is an arbitrary power, which is exercised by the railroads to-day, and in changing the classification they can change the rate. My idea is to put it in this bill, and I would have put it into the rate bill if I had had the opportunity, and I would include it in any charter relating to transportation that Congress should pass if I had my way, because I believe that it is a greater abuse than any of the other abuses which are practiced by railroads in the way of discriminations. Therefore, the amendment is necessary. If the Senator will read section 12, he will see that the right of classification is confided to this company. They can exercise their own sweet will as to what classifications they will provide. I do not know that in this particular instance, this canal transporting heavy freight like coal and iron ore, there is going to be much room for discrimination in classification; but still the bill confides that positively to the canal company, and I think it ought to be subject to the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. STONE. I should like to have the amendment again read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment proposed by Mr. MALLORY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BERRY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 14, on page 15, it is proposed to add as a new section the following:

> SEC. 24. Nothing contained in this act shall be construed as creating a liability upon the United States for the payment of the stock, bonds, or other indebtedness of the corporation hereby created, nor shall it be construed as imposing an obligation upon the United States to purchase, take charge of, or operate the canal herein named.

Mr. NELSON. I have no objection to that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. I offer an amendment, in section 5, page 4, line 10, after the word "may," to insert "in lieu of paying dividends;" so as to read:

That the said company may, in lieu of paying dividends, from time to time set aside a portion of its net earnings to be a sinking fund, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it is probably true that the language of the section as it stands was only intended to authorize the company to set aside a part of what would otherwise have been declared and paid out as dividends; but I think the language susceptible of a different construction, and if a different construction should be placed upon it, it would, in my judgment, work a hardship upon the public. The bill provides for the construction of the canal by an issue of stock and bonds in practically equal amounts; indeed, I believe in exactly equal amounts. If the canal company is permitted to charge tolls sufficient, first, to pay interest on the bonds—and they must do that, of course, to avoid a foreclosure—next, to pay dividends on their stock, and, in addition to both, to set aside enough ultimately to retire the bonds, it must necessarily follow that they will be overcharging the traffic which they transport. Under the rules which we have adopted in the railroad-regulation act, every common carrier is entitled to earn a fair return upon the value——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest that there is no quorum present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allee	Culberson	Kittredge	Piles
Ankeny	Daniel	Knox	Scott
Bailey	Dick	La Follette	Simmons
Benson	Dolliver	Long	Smoot
Berry	Dubois	McEnery	Spooner
Brandegee	Flint	McLaurin	Stone
Bulkeley	Foraker	Millard	Sutherland
Burkett	Foster	Morgan	Taliaferro
Burnham	Frazier	Nelson	Teller
Burrows	Fulton	Overman	Warner
Carter	Hansbrough	Patterson	Warren
Clarke, Ark.	Hopkins	Penrose	Wetmore
Clay	Kean	Perkins	Whyte

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, perhaps I can illustrate my objection to the section and my argument in favor of the amendment by stating a case. Suppose this company contributes in cash, for which the stockholders receive stock, one-half the cost of constructing the canal, and borrows on bonds the other half. If they are permitted, after paying the interest on their bonds and a dividend, to charge enough to accumulate a surplus that will retire the bonds, at the end of the transaction the matter would stand in this way: The people who furnished one-half enough money to build the canal would have paid the other half, not out of the dividends to which they were entitled, but out of the excessive charges which they levied upon the traffic transported through the canal, and they would own the entire canal, with only an expenditure of half its cost.

It is undoubtedly true that it is well for Congress to encourage the payment of this debt, and I believe that there ought to be a provision which authorizes a sinking fund, but let the stockholders provide that sinking fund out of their own money, so that when the sinking fund has been accumulated until it is sufficient to pay off and retire the bonds, the canal will have been built entirely with the money of the stockholders. It would not be right and just to the taxpayers—or rather to the shippers who, after all, are taxpayers, but they contribute as shippers in this particular—it would not be right to authorize in practical effect—and it seems to me that is what this provision does—a transportation charge sufficient to pay the interest on the bonds, to pay dividends on the stock, and, in addition, to accumulate a surplus that shall finally retire the bonds. That can not be accomplished except by overcharging the transportation that may take place upon this canal.

I sincerely hope that the Senator in charge of the bill will agree to the adoption of the amendment, because it only expresses what the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] said the other day was, after all, the effect of section 5.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I agree in part with the Senator from Texas, and shall make no objection to the amendment. It must occur to everybody that the sooner the fixed charges of the company are reduced the sooner there will be an opportunity to get lower rates. To allow a bonded debt to hang over the company without any diminution from year to year would simply afford them an opportunity to maintain their rates. That is one great objection that I have always had to some of the railroad managements, that, instead of taking the surplus which they accumulate and reducing their bonded debt from time to time so as to reduce their fixed charges, they allow that bonded debt to remain and to increase. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I propose the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, after line 13, it is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. —. It shall be the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate and determine the true fair value of the said canal, canals, property, and appurtenances thereto belonging and used, or to be used, for the convenience of the public. Such investigation shall be commenced as soon as any work on the said canal is undertaken and shall continue as improvements are made and contracts are executed. For the purpose of such investigation, the Commission is authorized to employ such engineers, experts, and other assistants as may be necessary. The canal company, or any construction company, or other person, firm, or corporation engaged in the construction of the said canals or works or any parts thereof shall furnish to the Commission, from time to time, and as the Commission may require, maps, profiles, contracts, reports of engineers, and other documents, records and papers, or copies of any or all of the same, in aid of such investigation and determination of the value of the said canals, property, and appurtenances.

The Commission shall thereafter, in like manner, keep itself informed of all extensions and improvements or other changes in the condition of the property of the said canal and ascertain the fair value thereof, and, from time to time, as may be required, for the regulation of tolls, charges, and services, under the provisions of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, revise and correct its valuation of the property of the said canal company. To enable the Commission to make such valuation and such changes and corrections in its valuation, the said canal company is required to report currently to the Commission, and as the Commission may require, all improvements and changes in its property, and to file with the Commission copies of all contracts for such improvements at the time the same are executed.

Whenever the Commission shall have completed the valuation of the property, or any part thereof, and before said valuation shall be recorded as finally determined by said Commission, the Commission shall give notice by registered letter to the said canal company, stating the valuation placed upon the said canals, appurtenances, or parts thereof used, or to be used, for the convenience of the public, and shall allow the company twenty days in which to file a protest of the same with the Commission. If no protest is filed within twenty days, such valuation shall be made a matter of record by the Commission.

If notice of contest is filed by the said canal company, the Commission shall fix a time for hearing the same, and shall proceed as promptly as may be to hear and consider any matter relative and material thereto presented by the said company in support of its protest so filed as aforesaid. If after hearing any contest of such valuation, under the provisions of this act, the Commission is of the opinion that its valuation is incorrect, it shall correct the same and determine a fair valuation of such property, and shall make such determination a matter of record in the office of the Commission. All such valuations by the Commission shall be prima facie evidence of the fair value of the said canals, property, and appurtenances in any proceedings under the act to regulate commerce approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and in all proceedings which may be instituted for the purchase of the said canals, property, and appurtenances by the United States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senate, by its vote on Saturday, rejected an amendment which would have authorized the Interstate Commerce Commission to control the issue of stocks and bonds by this corporation, limiting such issue to the value of the property and money invested in constructing and improving the canal. The Senate also voted down an amendment which would have clothed the Secretary of War with authority to prevent the fictitious capitalization of this corporation. This leaves the public wholly unprotected against stock watering, resulting, as it will, in excessive tolls and charges, unless some other measure is taken to prevent it. Surely the Senate will not now reject the proposed amendment the purpose of which is to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to ascertain the fair value of this property and keep itself informed with respect to all changes in that value. By the terms of section 9 of the bill, as amended by the committee reporting it to the Senate, the Interstate Commerce Commission is authorized to regulate the tolls which the corporation may collect from the vessels passing through the canal, under the provisions of the interstate-commerce act of 1887 and acts amendatory thereof in so far as the same are applicable. Under the law, as interpreted by the Supreme Court, the Commission should so regulate the tolls as to make them just and reasonable. But what tolls and charges will be just and reasonable? A just and reasonable toll is such a charge as will yield the corporation a fair return upon a fair value of its property, used for the convenience of the vessels passing through the canal. To enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix and establish such reasonable tolls it must know the fair value of the property of the canal company.

Now, if section 9 is incorporated in this bill in good faith, surely there can be no objection to authorizing the Interstate Commerce Commission to ascertain the fair value of this property. It can in no other way fix reasonable tolls or charges for the vessels passing through the canal. It is not often that Congress can, by legislation, primarily and directly benefit the great masses of the people of this country. As a rule, they must secure such advantages under legislation in a secondary and indirect way.

The owners of great aggregations of capital can apply to Congress and to the legislatures of the different States for valuable public franchises offering opportunity for investment and large profit to themselves. But to-day, if we will but perform our plain duty to the people, who are granting through their Congress a franchise to this corporation, which enables it to condemn private property, to divert water courses, to change highways, and even railroads, to-day we have the opportunity at the very organization of this company to place it upon a basis, with respect to the regulation of its tolls and charges, which will be just and equitable to the public and make this canal a real and substantial benefit to the people whose commerce will pass from the North and West over the Great Lakes and through the canal.

The amendment authorizes the Interstate Commerce Commission, without any expense whatever to the canal company, to secure information upon which it can determine just what is a reasonable toll for the vessels passing through the canal. If any objection can be offered to the proposed amendment, I hope some Senator will rise and present it before the vote is taken.

Mr. NELSON. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Chair the "ayes" have it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for a roll call upon this matter.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAY (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Not knowing how he would vote, I decline to vote.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], who is absent, I understand, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. HOPKINS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER], and for that reason I withhold my vote. I wish this statement to stand for the remainder of the day on all votes.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. I do not see him present, and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MALLORY. I am paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], who is not here.

Mr. WARREN. As I stated a few moments ago, I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. If agreeable to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], we will exchange pairs, so that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] will stand paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY].

Mr. TILLMAN. That is agreeable to me.

Mr. WARREN. I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 20, as follows:

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, because of the anxiety of the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] to conclude the consideration of this bill, I am reluctant to occupy the time of the Senate for even a few minutes in any further statement. But I am so profoundly astonished at the position taken by many Democratic Senators on this bill, seemingly on party ground, that I feel constrained to add something to what I said the other day regarding this measure. I would regret to separate, even on nonpolitical questions, from the body of my party associates; but when a question like that now before the Senate arises, which involves no party principle or policy, or any question of party authority, but which is a purely economic and commercial question, I can not follow blindly those who would lead in what I am convinced is a wrong direction. In such cases I need only to be satisfied that I am right, and being so satisfied, I would lose my self-respect if I did not have the courage of my convictions. I would infinitely prefer to stand alone, believing I was right, than to float with the current conscious that I was wrong.

Mr. President, I was a member of the subcommittee to which this bill was referred, and after a careful consideration of it I became convinced that it was a meritorious measure. After it had been materially amended so as to safeguard the public interests I approved the proposal to report it favorably to the Committee on Commerce; and after it was so reported to the committee I favored reporting it to the Senate with a recommendation for its passage. The bill was first considered by the Committee on Commerce as a whole, and hearings were had before the full committee. Maps were exhibited, explanations made, and witnesses interrogated. Then the bill was referred to a subcommittee, and that committee had several sittings, both public and executive, and the whole matter was examined into with the utmost care. I thought the bill should be passed, and I have heard nothing to change my opinion. No one claims that the bill is perfect. Perfect bills are very rare.

It is proper, therefore, to amend the bill, and no one should object to amending it at points where it may be imperfect, and several very excellent amendments have been proposed and agreed to. Other amendments have been offered and accepted that do not seem to me to be important, and some have been proposed that ought not to have been adopted, if the bill is to pass and become effective. It would be useless to pass it if it is to be so loaded down with restrictive provisions as to make it impracticable. There can be no objection to the most rigid scrutiny of the bill, nor to any amendment necessary to safeguard the public right; but hypercriticism is unjust, and amendments intended to weaken rather than to strengthen the measure ought to be rejected.

Mr. President, personally I know absolutely nothing of the men who are promoting this enterprise. Except the three or four gentlemen who appeared before the Committee on Commerce to present this measure to that body, I have never seen or heard from any person connected with the enterprise, and I can not now recall the names of those who appeared before the committee, nor do I know whether I could recognize any of them if I met them. I do recall, however, that they were gentlemen of fine intelligence, and we were informed that they were men of excellent standing. I do not know whether they are "dummies," as the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] intimated they might be; but they did not impress me or the committee as being men of that character. The personal aspect of those I saw was almost as engaging as that of the Senator from Colorado himself, and I could not pay them a higher compliment in that behalf. And as to their standing, character, and business integrity, I saw nothing, nor did anything occur, to excite suspicion that the Senators from Pennsylvania are mistaken in the estimate they have given of their qualities in those particulars.

The Senator from Colorado also delivered himself of a scathing malediction against the millionaires of Pittsburg. They may deserve all he said about them; as to that I do not know. But this I do know, that if this bill is passed, and the canal is ever built under its authority, it will be necessary to interest men of millions in the enterprise, whether they live in Pittsburg or some other gilded portal to purgatory. The Senator from Colorado is not quite consistent in his discussion—I might say his indictment—of the denizens of Pittsburg. In one breath he arraigns the millionaires and expresses apprehension that they are lying in ambush waiting to pounce on this project as soon as this charter is granted, and in the next breath he belabors the incorporators because they are pauper dummies, not millionaires, and therefore not able to build the canal. He pounds the millionaires because they are rich and have money with which they might construct the canal, and then he pounds the incorporators because he fears they are poor, and therefore unable to construct it. He would withhold this charter from the rich because they might build the canal, and he would withhold it from the poor because they might not be able to build it. I do not think that arguments of that kind, however eloquently presented, should sweep Senators who have capacity to discriminate and who sometimes indulge the luxury of reflection from their feet.

Mr. President, the opponents of this bill admit that the Constitution has clothed the Congress with authority to enact such laws as this. If that be so, then those who made the Constitution and those who have construed it did not consider that it would be dangerous either to the States or the people for Congress to pass such legislation. The danger of the Congress exercising such a power did not deter the framers or the earlier judicial expounders of the Constitution; but now at this day the danger of it rises like a horrid ghost to affright the wiser statesmen of this generation.

No, Mr. President, the bill is not opposed on constitutional grounds, but on some vague and intangible theories of public policy. Daniel Webster is quoted as saying that a corporation should not be chartered by the National Government unless it is to subserve some national object which could not be so well subserved by a State corporation. When the charters granted by Congress to the transcontinental railroads are referred to as illustrative of this Congressional power and as instances in which that power has been exercised, we are told that Congress did that to facilitate the transportation of mails, troops, and munitions of war. But, Mr. President, should the mails and the military be the only objects of governmental solicitude when this power of Congress is invoked? Are not the arts of peace as valuable and the needs of peace as great as those of war? Congress has power to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign nations and to adopt policies promotive of the general welfare. Is it less promotive of the general welfare or less within the legitimate purview of Congressional authority or of wise Congressional discretion to create a corporation to construct an interstate canal for the accommodation of the greatest commerce in the world, breaking the hold monopoly has upon that commerce and cheapening the cost of transportation by means of a great waterway—is that less within the legitimate purview of Congressional authority and wise discretion than to create a corporation to construct a railroad for the accommodation of the military forces of the country? It may be said that the canal, in a commercial sense, would be just as valuable if constructed by a corporation created under the laws of a State as it would be if constructed by a corporation created by an act of Congress. That may be so, but the same thing would be equally true of a railroad.

There are reasons, Mr. President, and good reasons, why Congress should create this corporation if we are willing to have a corporation construct this canal at all. One reason is that the navigable waters of the United States are to be used by the canal company, and the General Government should have a constant and watchful supervision over the company so that it may not abuse its privileges. The company could not utilize these navigable waters in the way it will probably have to utilize them without Congressional authority; and since that authority must be invoked, why should it not be sought in the first instance and in a way commensurate with the importance and necessities of the enterprise? Again, while it may be true that the Federal Government could regulate the tolls and practices of the canal company as to interstate and foreign commerce even though the canal should be constructed under a State charter, yet would it not be better for the public interest to put this canal immediately under Federal supervision and subject its business to the control of Federal authority?

Again, Mr. President, this is not a mere local enterprise, but one of great national importance. It is of scarcely less national importance than the Panama Canal itself. In some respects it is of infinitely more importance. So important is it to the commerce of the country that no man can say it should not be built. The commercial value of the canal is as clear as is the constitutional authority of Congress to organize this corporation. Mr. President, there is no good reason, founded in law or public policy, why this corporation should not be created and empowered to prosecute this great enterprise, as stupendous as it is important.

Mr. President, it has been urged as an objection to this bill that if Congress charters this corporation the day will come when the stockholders and bondholders will come asking that the Government take the canal, pay the debts of the company, and assume its responsibilities, and that they will base their demand on the fact that Congress created the corporation. Such talk is idle. Whether the owners of the corporate stock and bonds will ever approach Congress in that way I can not, of course, foretell; but I do know that Congress would be under no obligation whatever to yield to any such demand. The Congress would be under no greater obligation, legal or moral, to take the canal from a national corporation than it would be to take it from a State corporation. The National Government would be under no greater obligation to take the property of a corporation existing under national authority than a State would be under obligation to take the property of a corporation existing under its authority. If a corporation does a paying business, the owners of the stocks and securities are usually anxious to hold the property. If it does a losing business and becomes insolvent, its property it usually put into the hands of a receiver, and this is true of national as well as State corporations. If one of the railroad companies chartered by the Government should become insolvent, or if a national bank should become insolvent, would the Government of the United States appropriate the property of the corporation and assume its liabilities? Of course not. The affairs of the company would be taken in charge by a court and wound up by judicial procedure. Why should any different rule apply to a corporation organized to construct a canal? Such talk, I say, as that to which I have referred is absolutely idle; "idle" is a mild epithet to apply to it; and yet it is upon such idle, improbable dreams that opposition to this measure is largely predicated. Gentlemen who resort to such arguments, if arguments they be, as that must be hard pressed for something to say in support of their contention.

Mr. President, I am and for years have been an earnest advocate of water transportation, not only along the seaboard, but also across the Lakes, along rivers, and through canals to be constructed by the Government. I wish it were so that the Government of the United States could take up this enterprise and make it truly a national work. But, manifestly, the Government can not do that at this time, and years must elapse before we could hope to have the Government undertake the work. Because of that fact I am willing to commit this project, gigantic and important as it is, to private enterprise.

But, Mr. President, so far from fearing that the Government may some day possess the canal, I hope the day is not distant when the Government will acquire, own, and control it, for I believe that the principal waterways of the country should be under the absolute control of the Government. One of my greatest anxieties, so far as public affairs are concerned, is to see a canal constructed from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi River, and to see that river so improved as to make a waterway navigable for large vessels from the Gulf to the Lakes, and thence across the Lakes, through the Erie Canal or some other canal, to tide water on the Atlantic coast. That would be a stupendous undertaking, I know, but it is feasible, and I am as sure that some day it will be accomplished as I am that I live. I even indulge the hope that before my public career is ended I may see the systematic beginning, if not the ending, of that greatest of all national undertakings. Indeed, I can not but regard the construction of this Lake Erie and Ohio River Canal, even though constructed under private auspices, as the inauguration of a work which will ultimate in a great system of waterways such as I have indicated. Therefore I am not alarmed at the possibility of the Government some day coming into the possession of this canal, and I am happy to do any legitimate thing calculated to stimulate a national spirit and impulse in the direction of canal construction.

I have been told that this project is not in accordance with Democratic ideas, but is a move in line with Republican ideas. That is not a very high plane from which to view a subject of this character and of this magnitude and importance; but even this narrow contention is not well founded. I undertake to affirm that the Democratic party, as much, if not more, than any other political organization that has ever existed as a substantial potentiality in this Republic, is committed to the doctrine of internal improvements under national authority and by national aid. I will admit that in more recent years the less sagacious statesmanship of the Democratic party has sought to build on lines more restrictive and circumscribed; but, Mr. President, the Democratic party when wisely led has always been a party of progressive ideas and great conceptions. I deny absolutely that there is anything in the pending proposition inconsistent with Democratic party principles or out of harmony with the best and truest conceptions of Democratic statesmanship. Mr. President, I want to see the Democratic party once more take its proper place as the leader of public thought and public action. I want to see it a positive, not a mere negative force; a constructive rather than an obstructive factor in national development. It is easy to drift inertly and object to everything other people propose, but that is not a very proud and honorable position for a great party to occupy. A record of mere negation is not a record to boast of. I want the Democratic party to be what it has been, can be, and ought to be—a great, suggestive, potential, dominating force in American public life. I am for reviving the old masterful spirit of the party, and for making a new Democracy out of the old.

Mr. President, if we are to pass this bill, it should be a sensible and practical measure. It should, of course, be made as complete and perfect as possible; but I want it understood that I am not hunting for some excuse to vote against it. I voted against the motion of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to strike out section 5 of the bill. That section, at least as it has been amended, should stand. To raise the enormous sum that will be required to construct this canal it will be necessary to incur indebtedness and to issue bonds. It is to be presumed that the Interstate Commerce Commission will prescribe reasonable tolls for freights carried on the canal. If the volume of that freight shall be large enough to produce a revenue sufficient to pay the fixed charges and operating expenses of the canal, with a surplus over, why should not the directorate and the stockholders be authorized to set a part of that surplus aside to raise a fund for the gradual extinction of the bonded debt? Would not that be in accordance with prudent, legitimate, and honorable business conduct?

Why, sir, if the Government itself should borrow money and build the canal, is it not probable that the net profits of operating the canal would be segregated and put into a fund with which to liquidate its bonds? Why, then, should not the stockholders of this corporation be permitted to set aside at least a part of their net profits for a similar purpose? If they should not be permitted to do that, then how would the bonds be paid? In the course of time they would certainly mature, and payment would be demanded. If there should be no sinking fund, then the stockholders themselves would have to contribute to a liquidating fund or else a new issue of bonds would be a necessity—either that or a receivership.

Mr. President, suppose the entire net profits should be paid to the stockholders and no sinking fund provided for; and suppose that out of these profits, distributed as dividends, the stockholders should afterwards contribute to a liquidating fund for the purpose of meeting the bonds at maturity, would there be any difference, so far as the public is concerned, between that and the creation of a sinking fund in the manner proposed by section 5 of the bill? What difference could it make to the public whether a part of the profits of the business was retained by the directorate and covered into a sinking fund to be held under its control or whether all the profits should be paid to the stockholders in the first place, and a part thereof afterwards returned to a voluntary fund created for the purpose of paying the bonds? If bonds are to be issued at all, then a sinking fund to meet them should be provided.

Almost of necessity bonds must be issued if the canal is built. That is the only practical and feasible way of raising the money necessary to construct the canal. And I can not see that it could possibly make any material difference to the public whether all the money needed for construction was raised from the sale of stock or whether only a part of it should be raised in that way and another part by the sale of bonds. It seems to me that, so far as the public is concerned, the result would be the same. And so I say, Mr. President, that if we are to pass this bill, while guarding the public interests with the greatest care, we should not so hedge it about with limitations and restrictions as to make it impossible to construct the canal in obedience to its provisions.

Mr. President, the Committee on Commerce is composed of honorable men, none of whom is a novice in the conduct of public affairs. I can not but feel impatient when Senators rise from their seats and insinuate that there is some sinister design wrapped up in a measure of legislation reported from that committee. Such insinuations reflect either upon the intelligence or the integrity of the committee. I resent such unwarranted insinuations, but I am not otherwise affected by them. Others may do as they please, and will do as they please, but as for myself, I can not be frightened by such oratorical thundering and vocal pyrotechnics as have characterized the assault upon this bill. Being satisfied that I am right, I shall stand by my guns, let others do as they may.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I will not occupy much time, because I know the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] is anxious for a vote, as it is his desire, I understand, to leave the city, and I hope nothing that I will say will provoke any further discussion. But in view of the somewhat scathing malediction of my friend and neighbor I can not refrain from saying something. Here we are, the Senator from Missouri and myself, neighbors, with not even a fence between us, and, like a roaring lion, in a carefully prepared speech, he suddenly thunders out his anathemas upon me.

There is nothing political in this bill. The first effort that has been made to give it a political hue is from the Senator from Missouri. Both Senators upon this side of the Chamber and the other have voted for and against the different amendments that have been before the body, and if perchance upon most of them the Senators upon the other side and the Senators upon this have seemed to align themselves in party fashion, it is not because it is a party measure, or considered a party measure, but because there are certain principles in every school of political thought that necessarily and intuitively give color to the vote of every Senator when measures of this kind are before them.

And yet they are principles that are not altogether confined to the one party or the other, for reaching from one party we find that certain of its principles permeate at least beyond the outskirts of the other. The result of it is, while the votes may seem partisan, they are not partisan, and the votes, for the reason I have mentioned, have not been partisan in dealing with this measure.

I am rather gratified that the Senator from Missouri has proclaimed his independence of some imaginary party trammels. I do not think there was any necessity for that. Anybody who knows the Senator from Missouri knows that he is always independent, and that if it becomes a question of right and conscience no party obligations would control his vote or his utterance. No man should complain of that attitude upon the part of any Senator, for, after all, conviction should be the highest and the permanent standard of legislative duty.

Mr. President, I did not arraign the Pittsburg millionaires. I simply alluded to the fact that there are provisions in this measure which I thought were quite in keeping with the financial methods of the average Pittsburg millionaires, and when I suggested, by way of illustration, the United States Steel Company, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] admitted immediately—admitted in part, at least—the justice of the criticism. My suggestion was that Pittsburg millionaires, when it came to investment, had gotten into the habit of demanding four for one, and the junior Senator from Pennsylvania——

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PATTERSON. One moment, that the Senator may properly understand me. The junior Senator from Pennsylvania immediately admitted that there had been a world-wide, known, and great financial transaction in which citizens of his city did realize four to one, and he excused it upon the theory that the property was for sale, and finding financiers in the city of New York who were willing to purchase it at the rate of four to one, of course they did not feel disposed to take less than the purchasers were willing to give.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, the limitation by the Senator from Colorado of his remarks to the specific instance to which he now refers makes it unnecessary for me to say what I had proposed. I thought he was speaking generally.

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh, no, Mr. President; that was all. I used the illustration for the purpose of particularly calling attention to what I conceive to be the inherently immoral and financially rotten feature of this bill; not only a questionable feature, but a reprehensible one; and, adopting my standard of honest dealing in such things as my guide and examining the bill by the measure of that standard, I do not see how a Senator can consistently with the duty of a Senator to the people of the country give it his support.

Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] is no more enthusiastically in favor of great public works than am I. He will not vote more frequently nor can he vote more cheerfully in every proper case for whatever is necessary to put on foot and carry through great public enterprises; but I do insist, Mr. President, that when a company of men desire to have the brand of Federal approval placed upon their measure, they shall either so guard it themselves or Congress shall so guard it that it can not be made an instrument for the undue oppression of the traveling and shipping public. I insist that by the terms of this measure, and I believe it is the purpose of those who have so carefully framed it—not the members of the committee, whose good faith and patriotism I could not question, but the men who brought the measure here and fashioned it to meet their designs—they can and doubtless will arrange it so that through the stock issue and the amount of bonds that will also be issued the work will appear to have cost $160,000,000, while in fact it will have cost less than $50,000,000.
